Mr. ALEXANDER. With the gentleman's permission, I will explain briefly the provisions of the House substitute for the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object until the gentleman finishes his explanation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The act of June 24, 1910, which may be found on page 424 of the navigation laws of the United States, requires passenger vessels to be equipped with wireless apparatus. That act applies to passenger steamers carrying 50 or more persons, including passengers and crew. It also provides that those vessels should be equipped with apparatus for radio communication, and that the apparatus should be in charge of a skilled operator. This bill only amends section 1 of that act.

The first amendment suggested by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to the Senate bill is to postpone the time when the act shall go into effect till October 1, 1912. I am not sure but that the bill should be amended so as to provide that it shall go into effect on the 1st of January next, because I have communications from the companies manufacturing wireless apparatus and from the vessel owners who are endeavoring to secure operators stating that it will be very difficult to provide the apparatus and to secure skilled operators by the 1st day of October next.

The second respect in which the House substitute amends the Senate bill is to provide that the act shall apply to cargo as well as passenger vessels, where they carry or are licensed to carry 50 or more persons, including passengers or crew, or both. The House substitute provides:

That from and after October 1, 1912, it shall be unlawful for any steamer of the United States or of any foreign country navigating the ocean or the Great Lakes and licensed to carry 50 or more persons, including passengers or crew, or both, to leave or attempt to leave any port of the United States unless such steamer shall be equipped with an efficient apparatus for radio communication, in good working order, capable of transmitting and receiving messages over a distance of at least 100 miles, day or night, under all conditions of atmospheric disturbance when it is safe for the operator to work the set.

There are times when it is dangerous to the operator's life to work the set, for instance, during thunderstorms.

You will note that we further amend the existing law by providing—that an auxiliary power supply, independent of the vessel's main electric power plant, must be provided which will enable the sending set for at least four hours to send messages over a distance of at least 100 miles, etc.

Suggestions have been made that we ought to provide for an auxiliary power supply to enable the sending set to send messages over a distance of 300 miles or more, but manifestly if the ship was foundering at sea it would not be possible for a ship more than 100 miles away to go to her relief, and hence 100 miles for all practical purposes will meet the situation.

Mr. BUTLER. That is only six hours' notice. I was wondering why the gentleman did not increase the distance of the radiograph from 100 to 300 miles, but he is making the explanation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes. Then it is well known that daylight absorbs the radio energy, and the efficiency of the apparatus in the daytime is not so great as at night. The provision in the committee substitute is that the auxiliary power supply shall be efficient for 100 miles both day and night.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is nothing in this bill that binds ordinary tugboats plying in harbors to comply with its conditions, is there?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No. The Senate bill and the committee substitute both provide:

The radio equipment must be in charge of two or more persons skilled in the use of such apparatus, one or the other of whom shall be on duty at all times while the vessel is being navigated.

The criticism that we have no jurisdiction over foreign vessels navigated outside of our waters is a legitimate criticism, but we will not undertake to enforce any penalty against those vessels in our courts for an offense committed outside of the 3-mile limit, but it is intended to apply to all vessels of the United States.

The committee substitute for the Senate bill further provides that such equipment, operators, the regulation of their watches, and the transmission and receipt of messages, except as may be regulated by law or international agreement, shall be under the control of the master in the case of a vessel of the United States, and that every willful failure on the part of the master to enforce at sea the provisions of this paragraph as to equipment, operators, and watches shall subject him to a penalty of $100.

Now, the Berlin convention regulates many of these matters, and from time to time we may pass further legislation relating to wireless telegraphy, and hence that clause was inserted to meet those conditions as they may arise.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman for whose benefit he is making this explanation?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am making it for the benefit of the House.

Mr. GARNER. Who reserved the objection?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. GARNER. But the gentleman from Illinois has been busily engaged in conversation with two other gentlemen for some time.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I can listen to all that the gentleman from Texas says worth hearing and talk with two other gentlemen besides. [Laughter.] I have listened carefully to what the gentleman from Missouri has been saying, and I will say, further, that I do not desire to object. The gentleman desired to explain his bill, and I reserved an objection. I did not desire to talk all day on the bill.

Mr. GARNER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to bring the matter to a close.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. I want to ask the gentleman whether he has considered what might be the result of the language in lines 19, 20, and 21, on page 3——

That the provisions of this section shall not apply to steamers plying only between ports less than 200 miles apart.

It occurs to me that there are ports less than 200 miles apart between which vessels are plying and where such vessels carry a large number of passengers. I ask the gentleman whether it would not be advisable to have that language stricken out?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is the existing law, passed in 1910.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the existing law apply to steamers on the Great Lakes the same as on the ocean?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It does not, but this will. I am told that most of the steamers on the Great Lakes are equipped with wireless telegraphy now.

Mr. WILLIS. Even if it is existing law, does not the gentleman think it would be wise to have this provision stricken out so that the requirement might apply to vessels that carry a large number of passengers between lake ports where the lives of thousands of people are involved? I do not see why this distinction should be in there.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We were reluctant to disturb existing law unless it was necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amended Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DISPOSITION OF CONDEMNED BRONZE OR BRASS CANNON IN CERTAIN CITIES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 24458) authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to deliver to certain cities and towns condemned bronze or brass cannon, with their carriages and outfit of cannon balls, and so forth.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, this bill was read in the House in full two weeks ago and I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to waive the reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Virginia object if I offer an amendment to the bill?

Mr. HAY. Not at all. I think every city that wants one of these cannon ought to have it.

Mr. MANN. I would like one for the city of Chicago or for a Grand Army post.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment.

Amend, page 5, after line 8, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"To the city of Chicago, Ill., one condemned bronze or brass cannon with its carriage and a suitable outfit of cannon balls, to the use of L. H. Drury Post, No. 467, Grand Army of the Republic, the same to be subject at all times to the order of the Secretary of War."

Mr. GARNER. That does not cost the Government anything; it is subject to the proviso, is it?

Mr. MANN. It comes in ahead of the proviso.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

IMMIGRATION STATION SITE, BALTIMORE, MD.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20501) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to exchange the site heretofore acquired for a United States immigration station at Baltimore, Md., for another suitable site, and to pay, if necessary, out of the appropriation heretofore made for said immigration station an additional sum in accomplishing such exchange; or to sell the present site, the money procured from such sale to revert to the appropriation made for said immigration station, and to purchase another site in lieu thereof.

The Clerk began to read the bill.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have this bill go over.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I was just going to ask, at the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], that, pending some facts which he desires to investigate, the bill may go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4568. An act granting an increase of pension to Annie R. Schley; to the Committee on Pensions.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 323. Joint resolution authorizing Charles F. Riddell, cashier in the office of the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives, to sign all checks, requisitions, and papers in the place of U. S. Jackson, Sergeant at Arms, to obtain money appropriated for the salaries and mileage of Members of the House of Representatives during the temporary disability of the said U. S. Jackson.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. J. Res. 323. Joint resolution authorizing Charles F. Riddell, cashier in the office of the Sergeant at Arms, to sign all checks, requisitions, and papers in the place of U. S. Jackson, Sergeant at Arms, to obtain money appropriated for the salaries and mileage of Members of the House of Representatives during the temporary disability of the said U. S. Jackson.

DESERT-LAND ENTRIES, CHUCKAWALLA VALLEY, CAL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 6508) to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in the Chuckawalla Valley, Cal.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no desert-land entry heretofore made in good faith under the public-land laws for lands in townships 4 and 5 south, range 15 each; townships 4 and 5 south, range 16 east; townships 4, 5, and 6 south, range 17 east; townships 5, 6, and 7 south, range 18 east; townships 6 and 7 south, range 19 east; townships 6 and 7 south, range 15 east; townships 4 and 5 south, range 16 east; townships 4, 5 and 6 south, range 22 east, Santa Bernardino meridian, State of California, shall be canceled because of failure on the part of the entryman to make any annual or final proof falling due upon any such entry prior to May 1, 1913.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will state that I understand the situation and think the bill is all right, but reading it over hurriedly just now this fact has occurred to me, that it might affect some entries other than those the gentleman had in mind, because it provides that no entry shall be canceled because of failure on the part of entryman to make any annual or final proof falling due upon any such entry prior to May 1, 1913. Does the gentleman want to include any such entries against which contests might have been filed?

Mr. RAKER. I think this would cover them all. In other words, if there have been contests filed——

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman know whether there have been such contests?

Mr. RAKER. There seem to have been none, so far as the report of the department is concerned and so far as the information that I can get from those who live in the valley is concerned. I received several letters, one yesterday and one to-day. The history of the matter is set out clearly in the report. It simply gives these people up until that time to determine whether they will go ahead and try to improve the desert claims. There are about 780 of them, and there is a contest now between the United States and Mexico as to who is entitled to the water. This bill will give these people the necessary temporary relief until the water controversy between the United States and Mexico is settled. This relief is urgent and necessary and I trust it will pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, this is on the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE BETWEEN DAUPHIN ISLAND AND MAINLAND AT CEDAR POINT, ALA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 23799) to amend "An act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges or viaducts across the water between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands."

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910, entitled "An act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge, or bridges, or viaducts, across the water between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay, and to dredge the said Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands," be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That the authority granted in section 1 of said act shall be considered withdrawn and deemed to be revoked if the said railroad bridge or bridges and approaches thereto be not constructed and put in operation by or before the 18th day of September, 1916."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not suppose that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] in charge of the bill will know, but there is some item relating to this matter, I think, which was inserted as an amendment in the Senate to the river and harbor bill. Is the gentleman familiar with that?

Mr. COVINGTON. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the necessity for this bill is that the bridge work depends upon certain river and harbor work, and that the time for construction of the bridge having expired and the river and harbor work not having been completed, but an appropriation now being provided for it, it is necessary to extend the time to construct the bridge. It is represented that it can not be satisfactorily constructed until the river and harbor work is done.

Mr. MANN. There is in the river and harbor bill now in conference a Senate amendment. I do not recall just what it is, nor whether it is as to the same company, but it gives certain rights to some company with reference to Dauphin Island. I do not know whether it is in conflict with this or whether it is the same thing. Of course, if it is the same thing it does not make any difference. If it goes through in this bill, it would not have to stay in the river and harbor bill.

Mr. COVINGTON. I do not think it affects this proposition.

Mr. MANN. I think it does affect this, but I shall not object.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman where Dauphin Island is?

Mr. COVINGTON. It is near Mobile, Ala.

Mr. SABATH. Is that the property that is now being used by a railroad?

Mr. COVINGTON. I think so.

Mr. MANN. Dauphin Island is between Mobile and the Gulf. We have had this matter up a number of times in the Committee and in the House.

Mr. COVINGTON. This legislation in one form or another has been before the House a number of times.

Mr. SABATH. Is not this the fact, that this railroad is trying to preclude other companies from getting into the harbor?

Mr. COVINGTON. Oh, no.

Mr. SABATH. If I am not mistaken, some charges have been made to that effect.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman refers to the situation of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Co., in connection with what are known as the Turner-Hartwell Docks. That is a controversy with regard to the exclusive operation of certain water-front properties and the monopoly of terminal facilities at Mobile.

Mr. SABATH. That is it.

Mr. COVINGTON. It has no connection whatever with the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co.

Mr. SABATH. This is not the property or place?

Mr. COVINGTON. No. The dock and terminal controversy is a matter which is now before the Interstate Commerce Commission as affecting the right to the exclusive control of dock operations within the city of Mobile.

Mr. SABATH. That is what I had reference to.

Mr. MANN. This is an effort to construct a competing proposition below the city.

Mr. COVINGTON. This is an effort of the citizens of Mobile themselves to provide for the destruction of the exclusive monopoly that exists there.

Mr. SABATH. I understood there was an exclusive right maintained by the Mobile & Ohio Co., and no other railroad company was able to enter the harbor and could not obtain any facilities. I did not know whether this was owned by the Mobile & Ohio or was a separate and distinct and independent railroad.

Mr. COVINGTON. It is a separate and distinct concern. It provides competition rather than promotes monopoly.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman is sure of that?

Mr. COVINGTON. That is my understanding.

Mr. SABATH. And will give the people of Mobile relief from the operation of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad?

Mr. COVINGTON. That is my understanding.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It does not involve any cost to the Government?

Mr. COVINGTON. None at all.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is merely extending the time to build the bridge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

"That the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Alabama, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge or bridges, and approaches thereto, between the mainland, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big, situated in Mobile County, State of Alabama, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906: Provided, That the authority hereby granted shall be considered as withdrawn and deemed to be revoked if the said bridge or bridges and approaches thereto be not constructed and put in operation by or before the 18th day of September, 1916."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COVINGTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS GOOSE CREEK, BERKELEY COUNTY, S. C.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 6848) authorizing the Cooper River Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of South Carolina, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Goose Creek, in Berkeley County, S. C.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Cooper River Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of South Carolina, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Goose Creek, at or near a point within a radius of about one and one-half miles below the waterworks spillway, in Berkeley County, State of South Carolina, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GRAHAM). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk reads as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the words "South Carolina," insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COVINGTON a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER OF THE NORTH AT PEMBINA, N. DAK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 6614) to authorize the construction of a pontoon bridge across the Red River of the North between Pembina, N. Dak., and St. Vincent, Minn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the municipal authorities of Pembina, in the State of North Dakota, and St. Vincent, in the State of Minnesota, are hereby authorized to construct and maintain a pontoon bridge across the Red River of the North, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation within the corporate limits of said cities, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COVINGTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WALHALLA, NECHE, AND ST. JOHN, N. DAK., SUBPORTS OF ENTRY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4572) to designate Walhalla, Neche, and St. John, in the State of North Dakota, subports of entry, and to extend the privileges of the first section of the act of Congress, approved June 10, 1880, to said subports.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Walhalla, Neche, and St. John, in the State of North Dakota, be, and the same are hereby, designated subports of entry in the customs collection district of North and South Dakota.

SEC. 2. That the privileges of the first section of the act approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, extended to the said subports.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to discontinue the said subports of entry, or to withdraw the privileges of the first section of the act of June 10, 1880, therefrom, at any time when he shall be satisfied that the interests of commerce or of the revenue no longer require their continuance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I observe that this bill proposes to make three different places in North Dakota subports of entry. We have already to-day passed two bills each making one place a subport of entry and another bill of the same character was objected to. What is the additional expense, if any, to the Government where one of these towns is made a subport of entry? Does the gentleman happen to know?

Mr. HAMMOND. In the report it appears that there will be no extra expense to the Government. These are three small towns on the North Dakota border. Already a customs officer is there to examine freight and passengers' baggage, and if they are made subports of entry there will be no additional expense so far as known.

Mr. MANN. I know the Secretary of the Treasury reports in this case that there will be no extra expense. I desire to have it go on the record because I am very certain that that statement is incorrect.

Mr. HAMMOND. Unless business should increase so very, very largely that it will be necessary to have more officers there I can say the statement is correct. I do not see how there can be any more expense. The amount of business done in all three of those towns will not probably exceed $6,000 at the present time, and this is simply a convenience——

Mr. MANN. I understand it is a convenience which I think should be granted where it can be and where it is not too expensive.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, this bill is upon the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAMMOND, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONSTRUCTION OF BRIDGE ACROSS SNAKE RIVER IN WYOMING.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 21171) authorizing the use of the reclamation fund in the construction of a bridge across Snake River in Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] if he intends to object to the consideration of this bill. If he does, I do not care to take up the time of the House in having it read.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I much regret that at the request of my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] I will be obliged to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

LIGHTING OF PINEY BRANCH ROAD FROM GEORGIA AVENUE TO BUTTERNUT STREET.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 21708) to authorize the lighting of Piney Branch Road from Georgia Avenue to Butternut Street.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to light and maintain the lights on Piney Branch Road from Georgia Avenue to Butternut Street.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, considering the fact the District of Columbia Committee has been shunted a few times from District day, I suppose there is no real objection to putting a District bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, although that is not to be the customary thing.

Mr. LOBECK. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. Now, may I ask the gentleman: Under the existing law the District Commissioners have the authority to light this street?

Mr. LOBECK. They seem to have that authority whenever they want to change a street or make any changes in a street.

Mr. MANN. Well, now, I have been here a long time, and I do not recall any case where Congress passed a bill directing that a certain street be lighted. I am very confident that the District Commissioners have authority to light streets out of appropriations that Congress makes for that purpose. Now, does the gentleman propose that Congress shall hereafter determine in each case where a gas lamp shall be located and not the District Commissioners?

Mr. LOBECK. I only know in this case that this street was lighted for over 30 years, and I know from having seen the street myself that the lights should not have been removed, but by some authority the lights have been taken away from the street, and a wrong has been done to citizens and home owners on that street. It is a street that has much travel now, more than any street in that neighborhood.

Mr. MANN. Is not this the case, that Congress appropriates so much money for street lighting, but did not appropriate the amount which the District Commissioners asked for, but Congress made a reduction, a perfectly proper practice. Thereupon the District Commissioners, making an examination of the situation and being compelled to make use of the money as best they could, came to the conclusion that this street might do without lighting better than some other street and thereupon cut off the lamps. Now Congress proposes to order the lamps to be restored, but did not provide the means.

Mr. LOBECK. No. It is reported that the commissioners removed these lights, placed them on another street, and removed the lights from a street that has a great deal of travel on it, that has buildings built along it and homes built along it and has been lighted for the last 30 years. This street or road has been lighted during all that time. The lights should not have been taken away, as anyone will agree who will go over the street.

Mr. MANN. The fact is they cut off those lights in order to light some other place.

Mr. LOBECK. That is what is reported.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said the commissioners moved these lamps to another street——

Mr. LOBECK. You can call it moving, but they took them away.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether they did or not. The fact is that they cut off these lights because they could not light all the places they wanted to light, and they had to cut off at some place. Now, does the gentleman believe that it ought to be the policy of Congress to determine where a gas lamp shall be located instead of leaving that to the commissioners after we determine how much money shall be expended for the purpose?

Mr. LOBECK. If they do not expend the money appropriated for the lighting fund any better than they do in other funds of this city, I want to say that it is no credit to the commissioners. They have plenty of money to light the city with.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I understand from the gentleman that there were lights on this particular street before?

Mr. LOBECK. Yes; for over 30 years.

Mr. FOSTER. And the commissioners removed the lights to some other street where, in their judgment, they were more necessary?

Mr. LOBECK. They removed them a block away, so it is said, to a new street, and then placed some lights on that street.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman from Nebraska think it is a good policy, when the general law covers these cases, that Congress should be asked to pass a bill placing lights on certain streets?

Mr. LOBECK. Well, I do not know what you have a District of Columbia Committee for, if it has no jurisdiction—where the General Government pays part of the expense.

Mr. FOSTER. I gather from what my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said that you have a law on the statute book placing this matter in the hands of the District Commissioners.

Mr. MANN. Nobody denies that. That is too patent for question.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, you want to pass a law saying that this particular street shall be lighted, notwithstanding the statement of the commissioners that it is not necessary.

Mr. LOBECK. If I thought the judgment of the commissioners was infallible, I would agree with the gentleman. But the people who have spent their money in improving this street and in building their homes along it are entitled to protection, and the Commissioners of the District have taken that protection away from them. A light is as good as a policeman.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LOBECK. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I desire to inquire if there is any truth in the report that I hear to the effect that there is a tendency on the part of the commissioners to discriminate; that they do light certain sections of the city, namely, some special subdivisions owned by some real large property owners and discriminate against other sections of the city?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. How are you going to correct abuses if the exercise of the discretion is lodged with the commissioners unless by an act of Congress?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I understand the Piney Branch Road is a street that has been opened for 50 years or more, and has been lighted for many years?

Mr. LOBECK. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And there are other streets in that neighborhood that are being opened and paved and they are not lighted?

Mr. LOBECK. They are lighted.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand some of the streets connected with Piney Branch Road in this neighborhood are not lighted, and it is the intention of the commissioners to take the lights away from the Piney Branch Road and put them in some other place along that street?

Mr. LOBECK. That is my understanding.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no need for a bill to direct the commissioners to light the streets, is there?

Mr. LOBECK. They took the lights away, and the people want them replaced. They have been there for 30 years.

Mr. MADDEN. It ought not to be necessary to enact legislation for that.

Mr. LOBECK. The travel is greater on that street now than it was when it was laid out, and the lights should not have been removed. The commissioners have no right to destroy property to benefit others.

Mr. SIMS. Suppose the commissioners will not exercise their discretion?

Mr. MADDEN. There ought not to be any necessity for legislating in this way.

Mr. LOBECK. There is a church on that road, and many homes there.

Mr. SABATH. The charge is made that the District Commissioners in certain sections favor the large landowners.

Mr. MANN. Nobody who knows the facts believes that.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not believe we have the right to assume that the commissioners discriminate against anybody.

Mr. SABATH. Why, then, should they remove the lights from one street and put them on other streets?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman will find, if he asks why it was done, that it will not be necessary to have legislation. I object to the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. SABATH. Is the gentleman opposed to allowing the people on that street to have their street lighted?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I do not object to that; but I object to the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard, and the bill goes off the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN LANDS TO SULPHUR SPRINGS, TEX.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11149) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Sulphur Springs, Tex., certain lands for street purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, empowered and directed to deed to the city of Sulphur Springs, in the State of Texas, for street purposes and no other, a strip of land not exceeding 9 feet in width off both the east and south sides of the Federal building site in said city.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Who is in charge of the bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have looked into the report, Mr. Speaker, and——

Mr. MANN. The report indicates in this case that there is reason for deeding to the city of Sulphur Springs a strip of land 9 feet in width on the east side of the building site and a strip of land not to exceed 6 feet 2 inches on the south side. Is the gentleman willing to have the bill corrected so as to make the description of the land correct, instead of saying "a strip of land not exceeding 9 feet in width on both the east and south sides," making it "a strip of land not to exceed 9 feet on the east side and a strip of land not to exceed 6 feet 2 inches on the south side"?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It seems to me, in reading the report, that that was the object and intention when they drafted this bill. I have no objection to the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. MANN. That correctly describes it and saves any difficulty.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Let the gentleman offer an amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. This, as I understand, deeds to the city of Sulphur Springs, Tex., a strip of land 9 feet wide on two sides?

Mr. MANN. The amendment which I propose will cover a strip of land 9 feet wide on one side and 6 feet 2 inches wide on another side. They already have possession of the land under a license from the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the street the same width all the way through?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. How does it come that this particular point is 9 feet narrower, where the Government building is located? Did they sell it to the Government and then ask the Government to give it back to them?

Mr. MANN. The sidewalk space was a part of the lot. They sold the lot to the Government, which included what was used for the sidewalk space on the street. That being the case, they found that the Government owned that sidewalk space, but the Government then gave a license to the city to use that space for a sidewalk. Now it is proposed to deed to the city what is used for the sidewalk. Evidently in laying out the land in some way the property used for sidewalk space was not dedicated as a part of the street.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think it is well guarded. It says that it shall be for street purposes and no other purpose.

Mr. MANN. While it says street purposes, it means a sidewalk. There is a sidewalk there now.

Mr. AUSTIN. It is recommended by the department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 7, by striking out the word "both" in the beginning of the line, and the words "and south" in the same line, and strike out the letter "s" in the word "sides" in the same line, and at the end of line 8 add:

"And a strip of land not exceeding 6 feet and 2 inches in width off the south side of said building site."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. AUSTIN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FIFTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution 234, making provision for the Fifth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to extend to the Governments of the commercial nations of the world an invitation to be represented officially at the Fifth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations, to be held in Boston, Mass., September 24 to 28, 1912.

That for the necessary expenses of the meeting in the United States of the International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations, including a tour by the foreign delegates of the principal commercial, industrial, agricultural, and social centers of the United States, for the purpose of acquainting them with our institutions and enterprises, $50,000 be, and hereby is, appropriated.

That the Secretary of State is hereby requested to ask the Governments of the commercial nations of the world to notify the leading business organizations of their respective countries of this action by the Congress of the United States of America and suggest their cooperation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I desire to inquire if this bill carries an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. Fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then it is on the Union Calendar, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Yes; it is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, if I am granted unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill, I propose then to ask unanimous consent to substitute for it Senate joint resolution 72, which has passed the Senate and is now on the Speaker's table. Senate resolution 72 provides for extending to the Governments of the commercial nations of the world an invitation to be officially represented at the Fifth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce, to be held at Boston September 24, to 28. Since the resolution has already passed the Senate, it will immediately go to the President on its passage by this House. This resolution does not call for an appropriation.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then I suggest to the gentleman that he ask to substitute the Senate resolution, and I will ask him if he does not think there ought to be an amendment to the Senate resolution providing that no expense shall be incurred hereafter by the United States. I am not willing to vote for a bill which carries an appropriation for this purpose, and I doubt very much whether we ought to pass a resolution inviting people from other countries to come here for any purpose on behalf of the United States without providing for the payment of the expenses for the entertainment of our guests. I am not in sympathy with the proposition at all.

Mr. PETERS. There is no appropriation intended or asked for.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I have been fortunate or unfortunate enough to remain here in this House nearly 18 years and I never saw one of these little innocent propositions come in to invite people to the United States to participate in any exposition or other entertainment that we proposed to have for them that did not eventually cost the United States Government a good deal of money; and I do not think we ought to engage in this kind of business—of extending an invitation to foreigners as a national thing or that the Government of the United States should invite people here to participate in what is given the character and nomenclature of a national undertaking and invite them as our guests here unless we do propose to treat them as our guests. I am not willing that we shall engage in the business of making a mere meeting of the chambers of commerce of the United States on a matter in which the United States takes no part as a Government a national matter.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I will.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, this meeting is to be held this summer or fall?

Mr. CURLEY. September 24 to 28.

Mr. MANN. So that it can not occur that at any subsequent session of Congress we shall be asked to provide any money to meet these expenses?

Mr. BARTLETT. To pay those already incurred.

Mr. MANN. There is no danger of that.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have heard on previous occasions the solemn promise on the floor of this House that no such appropriation would be asked for later and still the Government has later on paid for the expenses. Take the Buffalo Exposition and the Charleston Exposition. We were solemnly assured that Congress never would be asked to pay any money, and yet we did pay hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. MANN. Those were expositions.

Mr. BARTLETT. They were local affairs.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the assurance of the gentleman from Boston that they will not ask for any more money at this time is sufficient.

Mr. BARTLETT. At this or at any other time.

Mr. MANN. Or, as far they are concerned, at any time. That would bind them and would carry it beyond this session of Congress. Heretofore these propositions have bound the gentlemen who made the promises, but they have not bound their successors or other gentlemen who came into Congress. In this case these gentlemen from Boston, being bound at this session of Congress, we will have passed the critical point before the next session, and hence there is no danger.

Mr. CURLEY. If my colleague from Massachusetts asks that Senate resolution 72, which has already passed the Senate, be considered in lieu of this resolution now pending, and it is passed on favorably by the House, does not that dispose of the question of the appropriation of money?

Mr. MANN. I was assuming that that proposition was the one—that we extend the invitation but that there shall be no appropriation made by Congress in regard to it.

Mr. PETERS. I will make that assurance on behalf of the chambers of commerce, that no appropriation will be asked.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not question the sincerity of the gentleman, but I wish to add one observation. The State Department has declined to issue such invitations heretofore unless some money was appropriated to enable the department to perform certain services which it claims were necessary. That was the way in which the $20,000 in two appropriations was obtained for the Congress on Hygiene and Demography, out of which was paid the compensation of $5,000 a year for the secretary of the congress. I simply wish to add that if the State Department makes a request for any money for services in connection with this proposition I shall assume that it is bound by this statement, as well as everybody else.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman may assume that, and that no appropriation will be asked for with my approval.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me, what is the purpose of having the United States Government extend an invitation?

Mr. PETERS. Because it is an international event. The chambers of commerce abroad are semiofficial bodies. Their Governments extended invitations to our commercial bodies; it is essentially an international affair. They have some semiofficial bodies which are cooperating to bring the delegations here. I hope the gentleman will not place any great embarrassment in the way of this legislation.

Mr. BARTLETT. Any earnest appeal by the gentleman from Massachusetts like that always meets a ready response from me, and I will not object if the gentleman will call up and pass the Senate joint resolution in lieu of the House joint resolution.

Mr. PETERS. I am about to make that request.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. What would the gentleman from Massachusetts think of an individual that invited another individual to bring his knitting across the sea and visit him and at the same time bring his lunch. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts was about to ask unanimous consent that the Senate joint resolution be substituted for the House joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts was asking unanimous consent to consider the House joint resolution.

Mr. PETERS. I will put it in one request, to consider the House joint resolution and substitute the Senate joint resolution in lieu of that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to consider the Senate joint resolution of like tenor instead of the House joint resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Senate joint resolution is on the Speaker's table, and the Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 72.

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to extend to the Governments of the commercial nations of the world an invitation to be represented officially at the Fifth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations, to be held in Boston, Mass., September 24 to 28, 1912.

That the Secretary of State is hereby requested to ask the Governments of the commercial nations of the world to notify the leading business organizations of their respective countries of this action by the Congress of the United States of America and suggest their cooperation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PETERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House joint resolution lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the House joint resolution lie on the table. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

PATENTS TO SEMINOLE ALLOTTEES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 23184, directing the Secretary of the Interior to deliver patents to Seminole allottees, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to forthwith deliver all patents or deeds to Seminole allottees covering their respective allotments: Provided, however, That the delivery of such patents or deeds shall not in any manner operate to validate any void or voidable titles or add to the weight of evidence required to avoid the same, or serve to remove restrictions that have not heretofore been removed by express act of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the gentleman reserves the right to object for, because there can be no injury done to anyone by this bill.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman was going to ask to have this go over.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that while he reserves the right to object, I want to understand if there is anything in the bill that he bases his objections upon; anything that he might want to object to the consideration of the bill for? I do not know whether the House will pass it or not, but if there is any valid objection, if there is anything that is not shown in the report the gentleman wants explained, then I am willing to make the explanation.

Mr. MANN. There is no reason shown yet for the passage of the bill, either by the gentleman or in the report. It is a bill that affects the administrative department of the Government, and has not been referred to the department for information or otherwise. The gentleman can not expect to pass by unanimous consent a bill which reflects directly upon the administration of the Government, without giving the administrative officers any opportunity to explain, or give information concerning it.

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is the very thing the bill does not do. It does not reflect on the department.

Mr. MANN. I think it does.

Mr. DAVENPORT. The committee investigated this matter, went over that question, and knowing that there had been some question by the department as to whether they ought to deliver the deeds before a certain court decision was delivered, they did not report the bill until after the Supreme Court rendered the decision, and said that the question of withholding the patents in no way affected the allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. MANN. The other day the gentleman was supporting a proposition to cut off investigations by the Interior Department by which it might make these investigations. He now proposes to have a law directing the department to issue the patents without an investigation. Possibly we begin to see why they did not want to have the money with which to make the investigation—in order that they may have a plea that they must give patents without investigation.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh, the gentleman from Illinois is certainly mistaken, and he surely does not want to leave the impression on the House that I at any time or under any circumstances objected to the Interior Department ever investigating patents in any of the Five Civilized Tribes, and his statement that as to what he saw with reference to my desiring to have patents delivered without investigation, is unwarranted and without foundation. I did object to an appropriation to keep a certain number of agents in the Indian Territory where they are not needed, but that appropriation had nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. MANN. We told the gentleman at that time that this money was necessary to make this investigation. The gentleman was opposed to making the appropriation of the money, saying that it was not necessary. That was what the appropriation was asked for.

Mr. DAVENPORT. It was not.

Mr. MANN. I say it was, and the gentleman says it was not.

Mr. DAVENPORT. And it never has been used for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

GRANTING CERTAIN LAND TO PORTLAND, OREG.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5910) granting to the city of Portland, Oreg., certain strips of land from the post-office and customhouse sites in said city for street purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant, relinquish, and convey, by quitclaim deed, to the city of Portland, Oreg., a strip of land approximately 10 feet in width off of the Seventh Street side of the new post-office site in said city of Portland, Oreg., and extending along said Seventh Street from Hoyt to Glisan Streets, being part of the east end of lots 8, 5, 4, and 1, in block S; and he is further authorized and directed to grant, relinquish, and convey to said city of Portland, by quitclaim deed, a strip of land approximately 10 feet in width off of the Seventh Street side of the customhouse site, in said city, and extending along said Seventh Street from Davies to Everett Streets, the Secretary of the Treasury to reserve such portion of said strip for the use of the United States as he may consider necessary for areas, steps, approaches, etc., the said strips of land to be used for street purposes only.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know why the city of Portland does not pay for this land?

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, the city of Portland has found it necessary to open Seventh Street more extensively than ever before on account of the increased travel on the street. They are building a large bridge across the Willamette River at the foot of this street, and in order to make the street of uniform width they desired this additional strip of land. They submitted the question of reducing the width of the Government property there to the same width as the other Government property along that street to the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. MacVeagh. The Secretary, under date of March 29, 1912, in a letter to the senior Senator from the State, said that—the enactment of said bill into a law would not militate against the efficiency of the buildings in question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why should the city not pay the United States? When the United States bought the land it paid very liberally for it. If it wished to take the property of any private citizen there, it would have to pay very liberally for it. Why should not the Government insist upon being paid now? Why should the Government donate the land to the city?

Mr. HAWLEY. The improvement of the street at the expense of the city will make the property so much more accessible and valuable to the Government that we can readily do this and still be the gainers by the transaction.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will not make it any more valuable to the Government, because if we ever abandon it for public purposes and seek to sell it we would sell it to some citizen in Portland for an insignificant amount——

Mr. MANN. Sell it! We would give it away.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Or give it to them.

Mr. HAWLEY. The improvement of the street makes the property much more accessible——

Mr. FITZGERALD. To the citizens of Portland, Oreg.

Mr. HAWLEY. And to the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I inquire about it because a few years ago the city of New York desired a little strip of land in Staten Island upon which to build a road around the lighthouse depot there——

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman ought not to refer to that, because I am thoroughly familiar with it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It very greatly enhanced the value of the property, and the city was permitted to do so on paying to the Federal Government about $33,000.

Mr. MANN. The city of Brooklyn—or one of the cities over there—desired to use a large amount of ground of great value to the Government for its exclusive benefit, and the Government gave it to the city for a song. The matter went through my committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. I am thoroughly familiar with it.

Mr. MANN. And so am I.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The road was around the Government lighthouse depot, and the city of New York paid the Government $33,000 for the land upon which the road was constructed.

Mr. MANN. For the benefit of the city.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was of benefit not only to the people of Staten Island but equally beneficial to the Government.

Mr. MANN. That road was exclusively for the benefit of the citizens there, and it was a detriment to the Government to have it there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. This street here is exclusively for the benefit of the people of Portland, Oreg.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Oregon a question, if I may; also the gentleman from New York. We have been quite insistent upon having reports from departments upon bills of this kind reported from committees. The distinguished gentleman who presides over the Treasury Department, for whom I have very high regard, reports as follows, and this is all there is to his report:

I have the honor to inform you that if said bill is enacted into law this department will take the necessary steps to comply with the authority vested in it by said legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the gentleman from Illinois think that is a very great concession for an official who lives in Chicago to make to Congress? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Yes; it probably looks that way to the gentleman from New York. Here is a bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to do certain things, and when asked for a report upon the bill he says that he has the honor to inform us that if we direct him to do it he will comply with the direction. Of course he will comply with the direction. That is mandatory upon him, but what he ought to have done was to give the House some information concerning the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. He did.

Mr. MANN. He did not give a particle of information in his report upon the bill, not an iota of information. He wrote a letter to one of the Senators from Oregon that gave a little information, but precious little.

However, I shall not object to the bill if the gentleman will allow me to help correct a defect which occurred at the other end of the Capitol. I object to their grammar.

Mr. HAWLEY. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. I notice that the bill provides for taking a strip of land 10 feet in width "off of" the Seventh Street side, and so forth. That is in the bill twice; "off of" some street. Now, it is sufficient to say "off the street," and I think that the House ought, in justice to its own dignity and standing, to correct this grammar.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman offer the amendment he suggested?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, in line 6, page 1, and in line 2, page 2, by striking out after the word "off" the word "of" in each case.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "of" after the word "off," and in line 2, page 2, strike out the word "of" after the word "off."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LAFFERTY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PATENTING OF CERTAIN LANDS TO RURAL HIGH-SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 1, NEZ PERCE COUNTY, IDAHO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4791) authorizing the patenting of certain lands to rural high-school district No. 1, of Nez Perce County, Idaho.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause a patent to issue to rural high-school district No. 1, of Nez Perce County, Idaho, for the use and benefit of said district, for the following-described tract of land within said county, to wit: Commencing at the southeast corner of lot No. 27, on the north boundary of Fort Lapwai Military Reservation, in section 2, township 35 north, range 4 west, Boise meridian; thence south along the west line of the Presbyterian mission reserve 300 feet; thence south 85 degrees west 726 feet; thence north 300 feet to the north boundary of the Fort Lapwai Military Reservation; thence north 85 degrees east along said military reservation boundary 726 feet, to the place of beginning, containing 5 acres, more or less: Provided, That Indian pupils residing within said district shall at all times be admitted to such schools as may be established on the lands granted herein on terms of equality with the white pupils: Provided further, That in the event the proposed school building is not completed within two years after the title has passed to the rural high-school district No. 1, the land shall revert to the United States: And provided further, That in the event said lands are ever abandoned and not used for educational purposes all right, title, and interest therein conveyed to the said district by this act shall be forfeited and the same shall revert to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FRENCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GRANTING CERTAIN LANDS FOR RESERVOIR PURPOSES, TWIN FALLS, IDAHO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2530) granting to the city of Twin Falls, Idaho, certain lands for reservoir purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent to the authorities of the city of Twin Falls, in the State of Idaho, for reservoir purposes, in connection with the water supply of said town, for the following-described land, to wit: The south half northeast quarter and the northwest quarter southeast quarter section 6, township 12 south, range 18 east, Boise meridian, in the Hailey, Idaho, land district, containing 120 acres, said patent to contain a provision that said land shall be used for reservoir purposes and in connection with the water supply for said city only; and in case said land shall cease to be used for such purposes it shall at once revert to the United States: Provided, That said city shall pay $1.25 per acre therefor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire what these lands are worth now on the market?

Mr. FRENCH. I presume that they have no value. They have been available for public entry for years. They lie many miles away from the nearest town, and, indeed, in a country that is covered with sagebrush, cactus, and juniper shrub. I regard them as really being worthless lands.

Mr. CULLOP. How far are they from any town?

Mr. FRENCH. About 18 miles from Twin Falls. There may be some small post office or hamlet nearer, but there is no considerable town nearer than Twin Falls.

Mr. CULLOP. It seems to me the price is inadequate for the land to be used for that purpose if it was anywhere near any settlement.

Mr. FRENCH. It would be, but I have no idea these lands are worth $1.25 an acre.

Mr. CULLOP. How many acres are there?

Mr. FRENCH. One hundred and twenty acres.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, this bill is on the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FRENCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGES ACROSS TUG FORK OF BIG SANDY RIVER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20593) to authorize the Norfolk & Western Railway Co. to construct sundry bridges across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Norfolk & Western Railway Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Virginia, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate bridges and approaches thereto across the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River at such points where the same forms the boundary line between the States of West Virginia and Kentucky, or the boundary line between the States of West Virginia and Virginia, as may be selected by said company and approved by the Secretary of War, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 1, lines 10 and 11, by striking out the words "as may be selected by said company," and insert in lieu thereof the words "at points suitable to the interests of navigation."

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the committee amendment by striking out, in line 1, page 2, of the bill, the words "at points," and insert in lieu thereof the words "as may be."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the words "at points" and insert in lieu thereof the words "as may be."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. COVINGTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DAM ACROSS CHOCTAWHATCHEE RIVER, DALE COUNTY, ALA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 22006) authorizing the Choctawhatchee River Light & Power Co. to erect a dam across the Choctawhatchee River in Dale County, Ala.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Choctawhatchee River Light & Power Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Alabama, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across the Choctawhatchee River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at a point about one-eighth of a mile below or west of the bridge across said river, on the road known as the Newton and Ozark Public Road, in Dale County, in the State of Alabama, in accordance with the provisions of the act approved June 23, 1910, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 21, 1906."

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. CLAYTON. And, Mr. Speaker, in that connection I would like for the name to be pronounced correctly, "Choctawhatchee," and not "Chocta-whatchee." It is a beautiful and historic Indian name, and I object to its being murdered as it was done in the reading of the bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS DELAWARE RIVER SOUTH OF TRENTON, N. J.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5458) to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across the Delaware River south of Trenton, N. J., by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania & Newark Railroad Co. or their successors.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 6 of the act approved March 16, 1906, authorizing the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania & Newark Railroad Co. or their successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River between a point south of and within 1 mile of the southern boundary line of the city of Trenton, in the State of New Jersey, and a point south of and within 1 mile of the southern boundary line of the borough of Morrisville, in the county of Bucks and State of Pennsylvania, be, and the same is hereby, so amended that the time within which the said bridge shall be required to be completed shall be within five years from the date of the approval of this act: Provided, That the said bridge shall be built and completed in accordance with such plans as the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers may hereafter approve, and until such approval has been given no further work of construction shall be done by the said companies.

SEC. 2. That said act as thus amended be, and the same is hereby, revived and reenacted.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I understand there is an objection——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object——

Mr. WOOD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a request before objection is made, if it should be made. I understand, after reference to the chairman of the committee, that arrangement has been made by which there will be opportunity for the persons who are opposed to this measure to be heard, and I desire to ask whether it would not be entirely satisfactory to have the bill passed without prejudice for two weeks?

Mr. WOOD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I prefer to have the bill stricken from the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. WOOD of New Jersey. I do.

JAIL BUILDING AND FIXTURES ON ABANDONED FORT ASSINNIBOINE MILITARY RESERVATION IN MONTANA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5817) granting to the county of Hill, in the State of Montana, the jail building and fixtures now upon the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation, in the State of Montana.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the jail building and the fixtures of said building, now situate on the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation, in the State of Montana, be, and the same are hereby, granted to the county of Hill, in the State of Montana, and said county, by its duly authorized officials, shall have the right to enter upon the said abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation at any time after the passage of this act and remove said buildings and such fixtures.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I was very much pleased a while ago on seeing a bill come in here from the Committee on the Public Lands proposing to have a State pay something for some lands and buildings which the Government owns. Evidently that feeling did not reach as far as Montana.

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the jail on the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation is practically of no value as it stands—no commercial value. Hill County was created in February of this year. There is no jail there worth the name.

Mr. MANN. Well, if it is a good jail they had better buy it.

Mr. PRAY. Havre, the county seat, is 6 miles from the fort. It would be necessary to remove the building and fixtures that distance from the reservation.

Mr. MANN. We would sell it cheap.

Mr. PRAY. The county could not afford to pay anything for it if the officials were obliged to pay for the removal of the building and fixtures a distance of 6 miles.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this bill contemplate the removal of the present building to another site?

Mr. PRAY. Yes. It allows the commissioners of the county of Hill to enter upon the reservation and remove the brick building and fixtures.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that it would cost more money to remove it than it is worth. I say that from experience.

Mr. PRAY. They are willing to take chances in that respect.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, here is a military reservation which has been abandoned. Thereupon the State asks to have the reservation, with the buildings, turned over to the State, without any expense to it, for certain school purposes, and the county asks to have one of the buildings turned over to it. Does not anybody ever think of old Uncle Sam?

Mr. PRAY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am not asking for the turning over to the State of Montana——

Mr. MANN. Not at this time——

Mr. PRAY. Of the buildings on the reservation. I know that there is a bill of that kind pending in a committee of the Senate, but it has not yet come over here. This building could properly be turned over to the county without affecting any educational institution that might be established there. An educational institution could hardly have any use for a jail.

Mr. MANN. In fact, when we grant land to a State for school purposes and it happens to be in a forest reservation, they avail of the right to exchange it, and then they sell the forest land for as high as $10 an acre and make a profit out of the Government. Nobody ever attempts apparently, in relations between the States and the Federal Government, to protect the financial interests of the Federal Government. The States and counties think if the Government owns any land that it is not using they have the right to it. I do not. [Applause.]

Mr. PRAY. I will say to the gentleman that the Government will not lose anything by turning over the jail and fixtures to this county. It is of no use or value to the Government. There are many precedents for a measure of this kind. The gentleman knows that heretofore, on the admission of new States into the Union, Federal buildings have been turned over to the newly organized counties, and I see no reason why the same thing should not be done in this case.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman had better present a reasonable proposition.

Mr. PRAY. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not object to this bill. The jail and fixtures are worth nothing where they are and could now be utilized by this new county. Even if the Government retains the jail it can get nothing out of it.

Mr. MANN. One thing is certain, and that is that the Government can not lose anything by our not passing the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. How long ago did the Government abandon this property?

Mr. PRAY. The fort was abandoned last November, and the buildings, so I am informed, are not very well taken care of. I can see no good reason why a little matter of this kind should not be allowed to pass. We have precedents for it. It has been done before a number of times.

Mr. MANN. There is full authority for the disposition of all of these lands under existing law, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects. The bill will be stricken from the calendar.

PATENTS TO ALLOTMENTS ON WHITE EARTH RESERVATION IN CERTAIN CASES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20739) providing for the issue of patents to allotments on White Earth Reservation in certain uncontested cases.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the expiration of 90 days from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be issued fee-simple patents in the name of the allottee for any land within the White Earth Reservation, in Mahnomen, Becker, or Clearwater Counties, in the State of Minnesota, upon presentation of the certificate of the register of deeds of the county where the land is situated showing that such land has been conveyed by deed, or encumbered by way of mortgage executed by the allottee prior to January 1, 1912, and in case of the death of the allottee by his heirs at law or legal representatives; and that no notice of lis pendens on behalf of the United States, or the allottee, has been filed against such land, or, if filed, that it has been discharged, which certificate shall be brought down to a date at least 90 days subsequent to the passage of this act, and when issued the Secretary of the Interior shall transmit such patents to the register of deeds of the county where the land is situated by registered mail, which shall be deemed a delivery thereof.

With the following committee amendment:

That from and after the passage of this act the status of the lands heretofore or hereafter allotted to the Chippewa Indians on the White Earth Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, as regards restrictions on alienation or incumbrance, shall be as follows: All lands of adult Indians enrolled upon the rolls herein provided for as mixed bloods having no more than one-half or less than one-half Indian blood shall be free from all restrictions. All other allotted lands shall be restricted and not subject to alienation, contract to sell, power of attorney, or other incumbrance by the allottee prior to July 1, 1933, except that Indians enrolled on said rolls as of more than half and not over three-quarters Indian blood who have allotments in area exceeding 80 acres may designate in writing, executed, witnessed, and acknowledged as a deed, 80 acres as a homestead, and file the same in duplicate with the Indian agent and the register of deeds of the proper county, and after such designation all restrictions as to alienation by the allottee shall be wholly removed as to the surplus lands over and above the 80 acres so designated. The Secretary of the Interior may remove such restrictions, wholly or in part, under such rules and regulations concerning terms of sale and disposal of the proceeds for the benefit of the respective Indians as he may prescribe. The Secretary of the Interior shall not be prohibited by this act from continuing to remove restrictions as heretofore, and nothing herein shall be construed to impose restrictions heretofore removed in cases where conveyances have heretofore been made.

SEC. 2. That within six months from the date of the passage of this act a complete roll of persons to whom allotments have heretofore been made, or may hereafter be made, on the White Earth Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, shall be made under the direction of the Court of Claims. Such roll shall show the allotment number or numbers, the name, age, sex, and quantum of Indian blood of each allottee, and when completed and approved by said court shall be conclusive as to the facts therein shown in so far as such facts affect or determine the right or power of such allottees to hereafter alienate, convey, or otherwise dispose of their allotted or inherited lands on said reservation: Provided, That where an Indian is found to have less than one-half Indian blood the exact quantum of Indian blood need not be ascertained, but such Indian shall be enrolled under the heading "Less than one-half Indian blood." And for the purpose of carrying this section into effect the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That upon the expiration of six months from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be issued fee-simple patents in the name of the allottee for any land within the White Earth Indian Reservation, in Mahnomen, Becker, or Clearwater Counties, in the State of Minnesota, upon presentation of the certificate of the register of deeds of the county where the land is situated, showing that such land, or any interest therein, has been conveyed by warranty deed or quitclaim deed, or encumbered by way of mortgage executed by the allottee prior to January 1, 1912, and in case of the death of the allottee by his heirs at law or legal representatives; and that no notice of lis pendens on behalf of the United States or the allottee has been filed against such land, or if filed that it has been discharged, which certificate shall be brought down to a date at least six months subsequent to the passage of this act, and when issued the Secretary of the Interior shall transmit such patents to the register of deeds of the county where the land is situated by registered mail, which shall be deemed a delivery thereof.

SEC. 4. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] reserves the right to object.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill introduced, I believe, by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], and he can explain the bill better than I can. I yield to him.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, as will be observed, the original bill was what is embraced in section 3 of the substitute.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman yield for a question or two?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. The bill now reported is really a substitute for a former bill?

Mr. STEENERSON. A substitute reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. GRAHAM. Has the substitute been referred to the Interior Department for a report?

Mr. STEENERSON. As I understand it, the substitute is the result of a letter written by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, by direction of the President, requesting the repeal of the so-called Clapp amendment of 1906, removing restrictions upon alienation by adult mixed-blood Indians on White Earth Reservation.

Mr. GRAHAM. Is there any report from the Secretary of the Interior on the substitute, or on the original bill, for that matter?

Mr. STEENERSON. The only communication is a letter from Assistant Secretary Adams, requesting the repeal of the Clapp amendment, and this is a partial repeal. This repeals the Clapp amendment in part. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], introduced a bill pursuant to a letter from Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Adams, requesting the repeal of the Clapp amendment. That was brought in before the committee. I understand the subcommittee—and I am not a member of the committee—deliberated whether they would repeal the Clapp amendment in whole or in part, and the result of their deliberation was that they have in this bill repealed it in part. They could not very well reimpose restrictions upon those who had been released. Of course it will be effective as to those who become of age hereafter.

Mr. GRAHAM. But no report of the Secretary of the Interior accompanied the bill or is referred to by the committee.

Mr. STEENERSON. There could be no such report, when they were acting on the initiative of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CARLIN. In view of the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] is going to object, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois object?

Mr. GRAHAM. I reserved the right to object, subject to the explanation of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON]; but I would like to ask, further, if the repeal of the Clapp Act is contained in section 4 of the amended bill?

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM. I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be stricken from the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

MANEUVER CAMP NEAR ANNISTON, ALA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution 322, authorizing the Secretary of War to accept the title to 4,000 acres of land in the vicinity of Anniston, in the State of Alabama, which certain citizens have offered to donate to the United States for the purpose of establishing a maneuver camp and for the maneuvering of troops, establishing and maintaining camps of instruction, for rifle and artillery ranges, and for mobilization and assembling of troops from the group of States composed of Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

The joint resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks that this resolution be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ZUNI NATIONAL FOREST.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 2875) to provide for the exchange of national forest timber in New Mexico for private lands lying within the exterior limits of the Zuni National Forest.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture, for the purpose of increasing the area of the timberland included within the Zuni National Forest by the addition thereto of certain privately owned timberland lying within the exterior limits of the said national forest, be, and the same is hereby, authorized and empowered, in his discretion, in behalf of the United States, to enter and to consummate contracts for the exchange of timber on any national forest in New Mexico for privately owned timberlands embracing in the odd-numbered sections of township 11 north, range 12 west, New Mexico principal meridian, which are now within the exterior limits of the Zuni National Forest, New Mexico: Provided, That such exchange shall be made under the following conditions: The saw timber on such private lands shall be exchanged for the saw timber on such national forest lands, thousand feet for thousand feet; cordwood and posts from piñon and cedar on such private lands shall, after estimate and appraisal by forest officers, be exchanged for an equivalent value of national forest timber at an appraisal of not less than $2.50 per thousand feet board measure; and the privately owned land at a valuation of not more than 62½ cents per acre shall be exchanged for an equivalent value of national forest timber at an appraisal of not less than $2.50 per thousand feet board measure: Provided further, That the national forest timber to be so exchanged shall be cut under the rules and regulations promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture for the cutting of timber on the national forests, and that the time within which such timber shall be removed shall be determined by the said Secretary of Agriculture: And provided further, That upon the consummation of such exchange the land deeded to the United States thereunder shall forthwith become and thereafter continue to be national forest land to all intents and purposes as if such land had been duly withdrawn by the proclamation which placed the contiguous land under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture for forest purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, this bill proposes to make an exchange of timber for timber and timberlands. It looks to me like a reasonable proposition. As I understand, the proposition is to exchange timber which the Government now has within the Pecos National Forest. The bill provides for the exchange of timber on any national forest in New Mexico. Would the gentleman be willing to agree to an amendment, on page 1, line 10, to strike out the words "on any" and insert the words "within the Pecos," so as to confine the matter of exchange to timber within the Pecos National Forest?

Mr. FERGUSSON. Yes. I understand the object is to exchange the timber in the Pecos National Forest for timber and lands within the exterior limits of the Zuni National Forest. The land within the Zuni National Forest is railroad land, the Government having the alternate sections. The object of this bill from the Government standpoint is to permit the exchange of the timber on the Pecos National Forest for this railroad-owned land that has been bought by a private party, so that the Zuni National Forest may be consolidated. At both ends it is for the interest of the Government.

Mr. MANN. And, as I understand, for the further reason that the timber in both forests is ripe.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Unless it is cut now, it probably could not be sold advantageously for a good while to come.

Mr. FERGUSSON. That is especially true of the Pecos Reserve, for this reason: It is away up in the mountains. The dead and fallen timber on the Pecos Reserve can be exchanged now for this land and timber on the Zuni Forest, because just north of the Pecos Forest is a private Mexican land grant which is owned by private parties, on which they have a mill now sawing ties. They have also a method of getting the ties out by floating them down the Rio Grande, at a good deal of expense. If that mill goes away before this exchange is consummated, then the Government will have great difficulty in getting rid of the dead and fallen timber, and, of course, in removing the danger from forest fires.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, on page 1, line 10, by striking out the words "on any" and inserting the words "within the Pecos."

The SPEAKER. The question will first be taken on the committee amendments. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out the words "enter and to consummate contracts for the."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the word "of" after the word "exchange."

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 17, after the word "measure," insert the following: "Provided, That the Attorney General of the United States shall first pass upon the title of the privately owned land to be exchanged under the provisions of this bill."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 3, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "upon the consummation of such exchange."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 3, line 3, strike out the word "thereunder" and insert the words "under the provisions of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Strike out the language in lines 4 to 8, inclusive, reading as follows: "and thereafter continue to be national forest land to all intents and purposes as if such land had been duly withdrawn by the proclamation which placed the contiguous land under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture for forest purposes," and insert in lieu thereof the words "a part of the Zuni National Forest."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "on any" and insert in lieu thereof the words "within the Pecos."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amended bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FERGUSSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AMERICAN ACADEMY IN ROME.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 125) to permit the American Academy in Rome to enlarge its purposes, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the American Academy in Rome incorporated by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, may by a resolution of its board of trustees enlarge its purposes so as to include the study and investigation of the archæology, literature, and history of the classical and later periods; and that the said corporation may take and hold real and personal property to an amount not exceeding $3,000,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to amend the charter granted by Congress in March, 1905, to the American Academy in Rome, which is a corporation that has for its purpose the training of American students in the art of painting, sculpture, and architecture, as well as in the study of archæology.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me ask the gentleman, does this bill authorize the ownership of real estate in this country to the extent of $3,000,000?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I must confess that I never read the charter granted in 1905. I dare say I was in the House and ought to be familiar with it, but I am not. Their office is in Washington, but the academy is in Rome. It had endowments given it shortly after the charter was granted amounting approximately to $800,000. Then Mr. McKim, the New York architect, made them a considerable bequest, and other subscriptions were given them that brought it up to somewhat more than they were authorized to hold. Within the last few months a lady residing in Rome has willed to the academy her villa, estimated to be worth between $200,000 and $300,000. They can not receive it and hold it under the charter, because it will carry the value of their holdings above the legal limit.

Mr. MADDEN. This provision in the bill which authorizes them to acquire real estate to the value of $3,000,000 is to enable them to take this title, is it?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Title to that property and other bequests that may be made. It is proposed by the friends of the late Frank Millet, whom many Members of the House knew as a great artist and a thoroughly high-class American citizen, to raise a fund of $100,000 as a memorial to him. He lost his life, as Members may remember, on the Titanic. The income from these endowments is expended in the way of scholarships for American students, to support the poor young men while studying art in Rome. That is the sole purpose of the endowment. This institution can not accept what is to be given it unless the charter is amended in the way proposed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SLAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RESIGNATION FROM THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to lay before the House a matter of routine business.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 3, 1912.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby resign as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Yours, very respectfully, ROBERT L. HENRY.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for 10 days, on account of important business.

SALE OF LAND IN FOREST GROVE, OREG.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18504) to provide for the sale of fractional block No. 6, in the town of Forest Grove, Oreg., no longer needed for school purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and to convey by patent in fee simple to the purchaser the fractional block No. 6, as designated and numbered on the recorded plat of Naylor's addition to the town of Forest Grove, Oreg.: Provided, That N. R. Wells, who has been occupying the tract, be permitted to remove the improvements made thereon by him and his family prior to the date fixed for the sale hereunder, and that the proceeds of sale be used for the benefit of the Salem Indian School.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether the department has not now authority under existing law to sell the land?

Mr. HAWLEY. It has the authority to sell the land, but is not authorized to make the arrangement with Mr. Wells, which fair play seems to indicate.

Mr. MANN. What element of fair play is it which seems to indicate that where the Government owns a piece of property and a man deliberately moves a building upon it without any authority whatever the Government shall sell him the land in order to carry out a fair-play proposition?

Mr. HAWLEY. This land was originally purchased by the Government for the purpose of establishing and maintaining an Indian school.

Mr. MANN. And was used for that purpose.

Mr. HAWLEY. For one year. The school was then moved to Salem, Oreg. When they removed the school they had some buildings on the land, and in order to care for what property they had on the premises they requested Mr. Wells to act as caretaker and gave him authority to move this building on the land. He has remained there and cared for the buildings of the Government during that time. The Government having no use for the land, desires to sell it, and the city desires to have the land subject to taxation, and so this proposition is made. Since the Government allowed him to move the building upon the land he has cared for all of the property without compensation, and it seems to me he ought to have the privilege of removing the building, that is less than $300 in value.

Mr. MANN. I do not find anywhere in the report that the Government permitted this man to move his building onto this land. My friend from Oregon says since the man has taken care of the lot for all these years, therefore we ought to do something for him. What is the fact? This was a vacant lot; it did not require or need to be taken care of. The man moved his house onto it, did not have to pay rent, did not pay taxes, did not pay anything, got the use of it for nothing, and then supposes that we ought to pay him for taking care of the lot which would have taken care of itself.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia demands the regular order. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Is the gentleman from Virginia going to insist upon my declaring now whether I object or not?

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman intends to object, I shall insist upon the regular order; if he does not intend to object, I shall let him go on as long as he desires.

Mr. MANN. I shall not declare my intentions until I know what the gentleman from Virginia is going to do.

Mr. CARLIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 4, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture submitting an estimate of reappropriation for inclusion in the general deficiency bill (H. Doc. No. 783); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 4, 1912.

The Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our heavenly Father, who by Thy holy word hast promised that Thou wilt in no wise leave us nor forsake us, and that Thou wilt be with us in the time of trouble, look with compassion upon us, we pray Thee, as we stand before Thee, with hearts pained and saddened. Our hearts are saddened by the loss of the Member of this Congress so suddenly called from the labors of earth; and we are sore pained for the Member of this body, our fellow-laborer, who this hour lies hovering between life and death. Be nigh unto him, we pray Thee, and comfort him with Thy presence. If it be Thy will, send forth Thy healing Spirit and restore him to life and strength, that again he may share the counsels and deliberations of the Senate.

And unto Thee, our Father, whose we are, living or dying, will we render praise now and for evermore. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18985) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. SHIVELY conferees on the part of the Senate.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of fact and conclusion and opinion filed by the court in the cause of B. COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. BORAH submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 7030) to provide for a permanent supply of coal for the use of the United States Navy and other governmental purposes, to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. SHIVELY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

LOSS OF STEAMER "TITANIC."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 327), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be reimbursed out of the contingent fund of the Senate an amount not to exceed $566.71 additional expenses necessarily incurred by order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce in bringing the officers and crew of the White Star liner Titanic from New York to Washington and care while in Washington in attendance upon said committee.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST CO (S. DOC. NO. 759).

Mr. CULLOM. I ask to have printed as a public document a statement by Rev. James L. White, a colored citizen of Washington, D. C., relative to the Freedman's Bureau and the Freedman's Bank and the balance due the depositors in the Freedman's Savings & Trust Co.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor will be entered.

PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF CERTAIN ARMY OFFICERS (S. DOC. NO. 760).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Cuban Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of War with reference to the receipt by the three officers of the United States Army detailed for service in connection with the army of the Republic of Cuba of pay and certain allowances from the Government of Cuba.

It seems proper that these officers, who have been placed at the request of the Government of Cuba in a position where, by the nature of their official duties, they have had to incur considerable additional expense, should be authorized to receive the additional pay and allowances which the Government of Cuba has generously tendered them.

I recommend that the consent of Congress be given as requested by the Secretary of War.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 4, 1912.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I rise to address myself to Senate resolution 315. I ask that it be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana calls up the privileged matter which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 315, submitted by Mr. LEA May 20, 1912, as follows:

Resolved, That corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States from the State of Illinois, and that his election was therefore invalid.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, in speaking to the Senate on this question I have no purpose to indulge in rhetorical flourishes; I shall employ no words of mere ornamentation; but I shall content myself by giving to the Senate as briefly and concisely as I can my views on the single question of law presented in the case, and as plainly and as briefly as I can I shall present to the Senate the salient points in this vast volume of testimony, as I conceive them to be salient points, with the sole view of informing Senators respecting the evidence adduced at the hearings, because I know that a very large majority of the Members of this body have not had time to wade through the thousands of pages of testimony offered in the case.

Mr. President, in addressing the Senate in support of the resolution declaring vacant the seat of one of its Members because of corrupt methods and practices employed in his election, I am performing one of the most unpleasant duties ever devolving upon me in the course of my life. It has never given me pleasure, sir, to inflict pain upon my fellow men, nor by word or act to do them injury.

In the practice of my profession, which covered a period of 40 years, my voice was raised many times in defense of men charged with wrongdoing, seldom in a demand for their condemnation, and in the few cases of that kind in which I succeeded in the conviction of men charged with crime, the pride of professional victory vanished as I witnessed the downfall of the men against whom my efforts had been directed, and the lamentations of the mothers, wives, and children of such men were so distressing that, except in cases of exceptional public importance, I abandoned that field of practice altogether.

My duty here is particularly painful, because the man against whose right to a seat here is in question is a fellow Senator, representing a State adjacent to my own, a man of pleasing personality, whose private life, as I understand, has been pure and whose home life is ideal. My personal relations with him during my short stay here have been exceedingly pleasant, and I can but regard him as a genial and kindly man.

The fact that he is a Republican while in every nerve and fiber I am a Democrat does not mitigate the unpleasantness of my work, because throughout my life my dearest and most valued personal friends have been Republicans, and while I come from a State noted for the fierceness of its political conflicts I am proud to say that in that Commonwealth the people are big enough and broad enough to yield to others the same liberty of thought they claim for themselves, and when the conflicts have ended and the smoke of battle blown away they recognize in each other the same good neighbors and friends that they were before they were summoned into action.

But, sir, from the moment I accepted the responsibilities attaching to a membership on this committee of investigation I have been deeply impressed with the gravity of the case, the momentous questions involved—questions momentous alike to the Senator whose right to a seat here is involved and to nearly an hundred million people interested vitally in the perpetuity of their Government and the stability of its institutions. And it is but fair to say that I believe that every member of this investigating committee entered upon the discharge of his duties fully alive to the importance of the case and highly resolved to render fair, impartial, and patriotic service to the country.

It would be idle to say that any member of the committee was without preconceived opinions on the question submitted to them by the Senate for investigation, for it was known to the Senate, as it was known of all men, that four members of the committee had served upon the Burrows committee which had investigated the same questions, five members of the committee had voted in the Senate on those questions, and that the other three, while new members, were men who had read the published testimony and the very able arguments made in the Senate on both sides of the case—that they were men who, having so read, must have thought on the subject, and having thought, must have formed some opinion as to the merits of the controversy.

I believe, sir, that every member of that committee realized from the beginning that he was handicapped by these opinions already formed, but that all were determined that there should be a full and complete investigation—a thorough exploration of every known place where facts might possibly exist which would in any degree illuminate the questions to be investigated.

That this investigation has been complete, and of an entirely different character from that of the Burrows committee, is attested by the fact that whereas the testimony taken by that committee is contained in a single volume of 748 pages, the testimony adduced before this committee fills 8 volumes and covers 8,587 pages.

In this investigation counsel on both sides were given the widest latitude, and neither pains nor expense was spared in exploring every avenue which might possibly lead to the truth and in bringing before the committee nearly every person likely to be in possession of facts which might possibly aid in the solution of the questions before it.

Now, sir, after the conclusion of these labors there are widely divergent views amongst members of the committee, not only as to the facts proven, the weight of evidence, the credibility of witnesses, but also on the main question as to whether corrupt methods and practices were employed in this election.

Mr. President, I hesitate not to accord to my associates upon this committee, collectively and individually, the same honesty of purpose and purity of motive that I claim for myself. From my point of view it is inconceivable that from the facts proven the members constituting the majority of the committee could reach the conclusion they have announced, but I recognize the fact that my viewpoint is not theirs and that I have no right, even if I had the remotest inclination, to asperse their motives or reflect upon their honesty of purpose. So that, while in the remarks I shall make I may with earnestness and zeal endeavor to enforce my views of this case upon the Senate, I trust that no part of this address may be construed as an attempt to belittle or stigmatize the members of the committee who do not agree with me, for they are gentlemen for whom I entertained the kindliest feeling when I commenced service with them, and the long months of constant association have resulted rather in strengthening than diminishing that feeling of personal regard.

RES ADJUDICATA.

Mr. President, before proceeding to a discussion of the evidence, I desire to allude briefly to the defense of res adjudicata which was first mentioned in the presence of your committee on the very last day of the hearings in February of this year.

I do not propose to discuss this question at length, because a majority of the Members of this body are lawyers by profession and those who are not are men of affairs, not likely to be misled by this eleventh-hour technical defense.

I shall only remind the Senate that under the Constitution it is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members; that acting under this authority on the 7th of June, 1911, it passed the resolution naming this committee and specifically authorizing and directing it to investigate whether corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois, and also to inquire fully into and report upon the sources and use of the alleged jack-pot fund or other fund in its relation to and effect, if any, upon the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KERN. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire once, and only once, to interrupt the Senator for the purpose of inquiring as to the status of this investigation. I have it in mind that only the Senate concurrently elected can inquire into the regularity of the election of a Senator of that class. I do not believe that subsequent Senates may go back and repudiate or overrule the action of the Senate to which the Member was elected. Were it not that we are divided into classes, and recognizing the fact that the Senate is a continuing body, I think there would be nothing in the suggestion; but the Senator was elected together with the Members constituting one-third of this body, and that Senate investigated this matter. Now, can a new class of Senators coming in reopen that question and review the action of the Senate to which he was elected a Member?

That presents a question rather different from the question as I have heard it discussed and read; but it is worthy of consideration, because if the next class can raise the question, it might be done repeatedly. If the Senator were reelected and reelected every succeeding Senate that might be opposed to him might reopen the question. It is quite a large and material question.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I have always supposed that the Senate of the United States was a continuing body, and that though every Member of the body might die, the Senate would still be in existence. I had supposed, sir, that it was a continuing body, the same as a court is a continuing institution. The judge of a court may resign; the judge of a court may die; and yet the court continues and the incumbent of the office of judge continues to administer the affairs of that tribunal. But I do not propose at this time to be diverted from the line of discussion which I have mapped out.

Why did the constitutional provision clothe this body with the power to be the sole judge of the qualifications, election, and returns of its own Members? It was to the end that the Senate of the United States might always act respecting the qualifications of its Members unfettered by judicial decisions or precedents, and deal with each case according to its own merit.

Neither during the debate, sir, which preceded the adoption of the resolution, nor at the time of its adoption, was there any suggestion made by Senator LORIMER or by anyone in his behalf that the Senate had not ample power to direct a reinvestigation of his case. He tacitly acquiesced in the action of the Senate. When your committee met he appeared in person and by counsel, and was present throughout the months of investigation cross-examining all witnesses called by the committee and examining scores of witnesses in his own behalf on every possible phase of the case, not only as to matters not called to the attention of the former committee, but bearing upon all the questions investigated by that committee, and it was not until the hearings had ended that intimation was given that the power of the Senate to order, or that of the committee to make a full investigation of the questions submitted, was to be questioned.

If any members of the committee believed that the questions being investigated were res adjudicata, they were strangely reticent in not mentioning it, but, on the other hand, proceeded with an investigation at a cost of more than $50,000.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment to set myself right?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. KERN. Yes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think, if the Senator will look at the debate preceding the adoption of the resolution authorizing this investigation, he will find that I called attention specifically to the du Pont case and the report that was filed by the committee on that occasion, written by the late Senator Hoar, where he used this language:

> We do not doubt that the Senate, like other courts, may review its own judgments where new evidence has been discovered, or where by reason of fraud or accident it appears that the judgment ought to be reviewed. The remedy which in other courts may be given by writs of review or error or bills of review may doubtless be given here by a simple vote reversing the first adjudication. We have no doubt that a legal doctrine involved in a former judgment of the Senate may be overruled in later cases. But there is no case known in other judicial tribunals in which a final judgment in the same case can be rescinded or reversed merely because the composition of the court has changed or because the members of the court who originally decided it have changed their minds as to the law or facts which are involved.

I will say that I called attention to such expression of views in the remarks I then made and based my contention on that ground, that it was alleged there was a large amount of newly discovered evidence. I do not want to interrupt the Senator; I merely wanted to set myself right.

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him if he did not vote in favor of the reopening of this case and a reinvestigation?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I did, and I advocated it. In doing so I placed myself upon the ground of newly discovered evidence.

Mr. KERN. But the Senator did not object to reopening the case on that or any other ground. He surely recognized the power of the Senate to reopen the case or he would not have voted in favor of its reopening.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Will the Senator allow me one word more?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I voted gladly and freely to reopen the case because, under the representations made, I thought, in view of the ground taken by a previous committee, whose views have been read, that the case ought to be reopened. I was fully conscious of the fact then, as I am now, that if there was no newly discovered evidence that would change the former action of the Senate the principle of res adjudicata ought to be applied, and thus have the matter ended. In my view of the case, not having found such evidence, I think that that doctrine should be considered and applied. I do not want to interrupt the Senator any further. I beg his pardon for having done so at all, but I did not want by implication to be placed in a wrong position.

Mr. KERN. I am glad the Senator interrupted me. I only beg to remind him that, while I have no doubt his mental processes were as he has stated, it is remarkable, if he believed the Senate had no power to do more than investigate or reinvestigate newly discovered evidence, that he voted for a resolution which commanded this committee to go out and enter upon a full and complete investigation of all the facts in the case and to report back to the Senate upon the original question that was submitted to the Burrows investigating committee in 1909.

Mr. President, if the power of the Senate under the Constitution to order the reinvestigation of a case for any reason is conceded, then this defense of res adjudicata must fail. Conceding for the moment that this proceeding is analogous to a civil action at law, the granting of a new trial, even on the sole ground of newly discovered evidence, opens up the case for a full and complete reinvestigation. And here the Senate, without reciting the reasons why, reopened the case and directed the committee to investigate the question not as to the truth of the alleged newly discovered evidence, to investigate not the question as to whether there was newly discovered evidence of such weight and character as to justify action, but to investigate the question as to whether corrupt methods or practices had been employed in Senator LORIMER'S election; not to examine new evidence which might be adduced, but to hunt out, hear, and report all evidence bearing upon the subject to be investigated.

The time for a plea of former adjudication was when the Senate was considering the question as to whether the case should be reinvestigated. After acquiescing in that action—aye, taking part in that action—and, without objection or protest, taking part in the proceedings before the committee, using the process of the Government in procuring the attendance of his witnesses before the committee at public expense, it is now too late for Senator LORIMER to be permitted to urge this remarkable defense.

Mr. President, I do not know what prompted other Senators to vote for a reinvestigation of this case except as they stated the reasons for their action on the floor of the Senate, and only a few of them expressed themselves upon that question. It was not solely on account of the newly discovered evidence that I voted for this second investigation. I was very largely influenced to that action by the firm belief that the first investigation had been utterly incomplete and had failed to develop facts which must have been accessible.

I could not fail to observe that the confessions of Link, Beckemeyer, and Holstlaw had been discredited by that committee because of the claim that they had been coerced into making them by barbarous methods alleged to have been employed by the prosecuting officers of Cook and Sangamon Counties, and yet these prosecuting officers were not permitted to come before the committee and refute these charges, as they have done in this investigation. Although one of the chief offenders, as alleged, the distinguished and able prosecuting attorney of Cook County, Ill., was before the Burrows committee he was not asked a single question on the subject of the coercion of these men.

This case, sir, largely turns upon that proposition. The confessions of Beckemeyer and Holstlaw and Link were repudiated by the Senate, in speeches made on the floor of this body, for the sole reason that they had been coerced into making them by methods intolerable in a civilized country. And yet, sir, the prosecuting officers charged with the employment of these methods were not asked a word on the subject as to whether or not the charges were well grounded.

I might cite numerous other instances of the failure of that committee to investigate important questions which of necessity pressed upon them, but the one instance named is fairly illustrative.

Whatever the causes that existed for ordering the reinvestigation, it was ordered; that order was acted on; the new investigation has been made, Senator LORIMER freely and without protest participating in it; and the report of the committee is here for final disposition. It will be quite apparent to lawyers that this plea comes too late, if it ever could have been made. The plea itself is res adjudicata.

I desire to call attention to some of the statements and arguments made on this subject in the report of the majority. I read from page 38:

> Before the public hearings in this case closed counsel for Mr. LORIMER raised the contention that all of the issues relating to the election and qualifications of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois had been adjudicated and finally determined by the Senate of the United States by its action on the 1st day of March, 1911; that such former adjudication and final determination of the issues was in law and justice a bar to any further proceedings designed to call in question the validity and legality of the election of Mr. LORIMER and his right to his seat in the Senate.
> Your committee is of the opinion that all such issues touching the election and qualifications of WILLIAM LORIMER were so finally adjudicated, and that the action of the Senate on the 1st day of March, 1911, recognizing the right of Mr. LORIMER to retain his seat in the Senate of the United States is a bar to any further proceedings in the Senate.

Again, from page 41:

> Under all the authorities we have been able to find, the Senate acts in this matter in a judicial character and its decision is of the same nature as the decision of any regularly constituted court of justice, and has the same force and effect. We are here exercising a judicial function. This being true, the doctrine of res adjudicata applies in this case.

> Our conclusion is the doctrine of res adjudicata applies here and the former judgment of the Senate, rendered March 1, 1911, herein is conclusive.
> Under the principles laid down by the highest judicial tribunals in the land, the Senate of the Sixty-second Congress would not question the title of Mr. LORIMER to his seat, the right to which was determined in the Sixty-first Congress, even though new evidence had been produced to impeach it. This committee, however, would not feel inclined to follow this rule implicitly—

Why not? If we are sitting as a judicial body, bound by judicial precedents—if, as a court, we are bound by the law—what warrant is there for the suggestion here that the Senate ought not under any circumstances to apply those judicial authorities and precedents?

> This committee, however, would not feel inclined to follow this rule implicitly, and if new and substantial evidence had been discovered showing clearly that he had secured his election by corruption we would recommend—> we would recommend a reconsideration in order that the honor and integrity of the Senate may be maintained. Absolutely no new and substantial evidence has been discovered impeaching his title, and for the Senate under such circumstances to reconsider its action taken in another Congress would be to invoke the rule of might instead of the rule of right, and would violate the uniform and universal rule of action followed by all the courts of Christendom and the unbroken precedents of the Senate itself.

If there has been new evidence which tended to impeach the title of the sitting Member, I assume they would agree that the case ought to be reopened and that the Senate ought to act upon the report. I assume that if the new evidence discovered fortified or confirmed the evidence already introduced the same rule would obtain. If, then, it be shown in this evidence, new and old, that four malefactors have confessed participation in the corruption charged; if it be shown that these men were corrupted by Lee O'Neill Browne and his accredited agent, Robert E. Wilson; if it be shown that Lee O'Neill Browne was the active and duly accredited agent of Senator LORIMER; if by the new evidence or by the new and old the relationship between White and Browne and LORIMER has been traced and shown to have continued until very nearly the time of the exposure, and if it be further shown that Browne and LORIMER attempted to quiet White by providing him, a Democrat, with an appointment in a Republican county office in Chicago; if it be shown that Senator LORIMER's interest in Browne continued to be such that he paid $10,000 out of his own funds to aid in his defense in a case where his guilt was unmistakable; if it be shown that about the time of the payment of the corruption money to White, Beckemeyer, Link, and Holstlaw, a number of other Democratic members who had betrayed their people in the matter, were exhibiting almost simultaneously in various parts of the State $100 bills which they had in their possession and for which they were unable to account; if circumstances have multiplied since the former hearing dispelling all doubt as to the bribery of Holstlaw and the other confessing malefactors, then, according to the report of the majority, the honor and integrity of the Senate would demand affirmative action regardless of the defense of res adjudicata. These things which I have just enumerated I propose in a subsequent part of this address to show. Every member of the majority of this committee is a lawyer of experience and ability. So every such member, in common with every lawyer in the country, is entirely familiar with the law of res adjudicata. The law of res adjudicata has not changed since the Senate voted on the 7th of June, 1911. It has not changed for a hundred years. The principle is so well known to lawyers that it is regarded as one of the elementary, fundamental principles. If it is the law now that the Senate was without power to reopen and cause the reinvestigation of the case, it was without power on the 7th of June 1911, and it must have been known then to every lawyer in this body, including the members of the investigating committee. Yet, as I pointed out a while ago, the distinguished Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the committee, addressed the Senate in favor of a reinvestigation and favored the proposition to place the work of reinvestigating the case into the hands of his committee; and every member of the committee, I believe, voted in favor of opening the case.

There was a proposition pending in the Senate for a month to refer this matter of reinvestigation to a special committee of five members. That was opposed, I believe, by every member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, including myself. If these gentlemen believed then as they believe and declare now, why did they not decline this useless and fruitless task? If the Senate was without power to act, and the committee, its creature, was under the law to be sent forth to combat imaginary windmills and be compelled to report, after seven long, weary months of effort, that its work according to law and precedent was a joke, why did not these gentlemen of the majority declare their views of the law and spare the country the expense of the investigation and spare the members of the committee that very arduous and trying experience during the heated and sultry days of last July and August while this investigation was grinding its weary way along? One Senator here, a member of the committee, has declared in an address to the Senate that he was so intent upon his duties as a member of this committee that he did not permit himself to read the newspaper accounts of the investigation during the seven or eight long months that it dragged along. His life during that period must have been a dreary waste. Why did he subject himself to such cruel privation if, as a lawyer, he knew that the committee was powerless to condemn and the Senate powerless to act except in violation of law and precedents?

If this defense prevails, the plain people of the country, unfamiliar with this technical term of the law, will be utterly confused and bewildered, and they will ask: "Is it true that four men confessed to taking bribes, two of whom connected the bribe with the election of the Senator?" and the answer must be, "Yes; it is true, but it was res adjudicata"; and then, when the question is asked whether the confessions of these men were fortified by other circumstances, and the answer is given, "Yes; fortified and buttressed at every point until doubt was dispelled"; and the next questions follows, "Why, then, no action?" the only response, res adjudicata. Is it true that there were all over the State of Illinois, immediately upon the distribution of this money, a dozen members of the legislature, impecunious and bankrupt before that time, who all at once began to display hundred-dollar bills? Is it true that they were unable in a single instance to account for their possession of those hundred-dollar bills? Yes; it is true. Then, adding that to the confession, adding that to the fortification and buttressing of the confessions by outside evidence, adding to that the thousand other circumstances of the case, the innocent voter will puzzle his brain as to how there could be escape in such a case, but he will have to be satisfied with the explanation that puzzles him still more—res adjudicata.

Fellow Senators, I know it is urged here that the people of this country are not to be consulted by the Members of this body in cases of this kind. It is claimed, perhaps, that they are not even to be considered in such cases. But you must be aware of the impression that would be made upon the public mind by a decision that this hairsplitting defense of res adjudicata is a sufficient answer to these serious charges. Such a decision would be received with derision in every part of the country by the men and women who believe in fair and open administration of justice and whose common sense tells them that the interposition of such a defense is for the purpose of thwarting justice rather than promoting it.

Gentlemen, this charge is too serious and this evidence too strong for the course of justice to be thwarted by this miserable technical defense which was born out of the travail of the closing scenes of the committee's hearings.

Mr. President, having concluded this part of my speech, as I have been indisposed all the forenoon, I should like to continue my remarks to-morrow.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 24023, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations on page 12. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee so that it will read:

The library collected by the National Monetary Commission is hereby made a part of the Library of Congress and is placed under the administration of the Librarian of Congress, and the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purpose of moving the books and the present stacks and shelving to the Library of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, for fear there may be some Senators present who were not present upon yesterday when this question was under consideration, I wish that they may at least understand it.

It is an amendment to a Senate committee amendment. The Senate committee amendment provides that the library collected by the National Monetary Commission shall be transferred ultimately to the Library of Congress, but it provides that in the meantime it shall be kept and maintained at the Senate Office Building under the charge of a custodian at $2,500 a year. The Senate committee amendment as amended by my amendment would force the removal of the library of the Monetary Commission to the Congressional Library at once and do away with the necessity of the salary of this custodian. That is the question as it presents itself sharply for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Mississippi how many volumes are in that so-called library at the present time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that there are from 6,000 to 8,000, but I do not know. I have understood that to be the number. I made inquiry and was so informed.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I do not think there are near so many as that, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire, because I went into the room. It is a small office room, just as Senators have in the Senate Office Building, and that one room is pretty well filled up. Then there are two or three cases in the Senate Finance Committee room with volumes in them, but they are large volumes. I should estimate that there are about 3,000 volumes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are very expensive books, and I have been told that there are 6,000 or 8,000 volumes. I know they fill one whole side of the Finance Committee room, and I know they fill one room and spread out into another. They overflow two rooms, one a very large one.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think there could not be six or eight thousand volumes, but I have not made a personal examination recently.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked some Senator yesterday going down on the street car. We were talking about it, and he said there were six or eight thousand volumes. It astonished me somewhat that there was so great a number of them. It is a regular little library, and a very valuable one.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. It is as to whether these volumes or any of them are in duplicate. I do not understand that they are. So those books ought not to be taken from the library as we ordinarily take books for independent use, because some other Senator might desire to use the same books at the same time. I should like to inquire during what hours the library is kept open.

Mr. WARREN. From 9 in the morning until 10 at night.

Mr. HEYBURN. The hours are the same as at the Congressional Library?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, I thought the Senator was inquiring about the Congressional Library.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know about that. I refer to the library where it is now located.

Mr. WARREN. I suppose that would be arranged, if not the same way, according to whatever the wants of the public might be.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand it is not kept open now during any specified hours, so that it is only available when the custodian happens to be there. Is that a fact?

Mr. WARREN. As I understand it, it is rather disorganized now, since the Monetary Commission has ceased to exist. I do not know that I would be able to inform the Senator what the regulations are as to hours.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have this in mind: Senators must do the work in connection with any question depending upon the use of that library out of hours—that is to say, when we are not in session. If the books were at the Congressional Library, they would be available in the evening. If Senators were working upon any question that might be up for consideration they would want to have access to that library out of hours—that is, out of senatorial hours.

I do not understand that the library is now opened at any particular time, but, of course, if the books were in the Congressional Library we could go over there in the evening and spend an hour or two in investigating questions that might be up for consideration, and it would be very much more convenient, unless corresponding regulations could be made as to the keeping open of this library.

I speak only from what I should consider my own methods. Questions necessitating the use of that library would be taken up after the Senate had adjourned, and probably after this custodian had locked up the rooms and gone away, while if the books were at the Congressional Library we could go over there through the evening hours up to 10 o'clock and have a convenient reference to them or use of them.

Mr. WARREN. I have some information here which I will give when the Senator is through.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield until the Senator gives it.

Mr. WARREN. I should like the attention of the Senator from Mississippi. The Senator from Mississippi yesterday, and I assume he may have the same impression to-day, thought there must be a Senegambian in the woodpile somewhere about the library. I have taken some pains to ascertain. I understood, when we adopted this amendment in committee, that it was on the recommendation of the Librarian of Congress as the best solution of this problem. I now hold in my hand a letter written by the librarian covering the ground, and I will ask if the Senator will kindly allow it to be read at this time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read by the Secretary.

Mr. WARREN. I will say before the reading that the reason why this man was employed was because he was recommended by the librarian as being the man who should have charge of the library, and he had no backing from any Senator or Member of Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not raise a question as to his efficiency or the propriety of his appointment.

Mr. WARREN. This will cover the point the Senator has been talking about.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY,
UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., June 4, 1912.

MY DEAR SENATOR WARREN: If I recall rightly the details, I was asked to recommend a librarian for the Monetary Commission, and immediately and without hesitation recommended Mr. Slade as admirably fitted for the post by education, training, and a long experience with us in the Library of Congress precisely to the purpose.

Faithfully, yours,

HERBERT PUTNAM.

I may add that if the project be carried out, Mr. Slade would, as custodian, render a service to Senators and the Senate committees far in excess of the mere care and use of that collection, for his knowledge of the Library of Congress is such that he would constantly draw upon it in their behalf, and, in fact, act as an outpost of it.

Should the collection come to the main library, it could not well be kept separate, but would have to be merged. It would not in this case require the special custodian. On the other hand, its usefulness would be greatly impaired by the lack of one devoted to it, with close knowledge of it, and applying himself to the duty of making it serviceable to Congress.

Mr. WARREN. I have only one further word to add. Of course, I am presenting the matter for Senators according to the information I get. I shall be perfectly satisfied with whatever the Senate chooses to do; but it seems to me that one point ought to be considered now. If this is a rare library that is not easily duplicated and is now kept together where a reference to it can be made instantly, we ought not to distribute it all through the Congressional Library.

If that is what you wish to do, to avoid the employment of a custodian, well and good; but if, on the other hand, it is worth preserving the individuality of that library and you have to have a custodian, then the question of the custodian would seem to be eliminated and it comes down to the question of where it would be best protected and most convenient.

Mr. HEYBURN. It could be just as well protected and as completely under the management of a custodian in the Congressional Library if we direct that it shall be so.

Mr. WARREN. But the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi does not carry any provision for that, and we should have to provide for it if it is to have a custodian.

Mr. HEYBURN. I attach little importance to the question of the salary, because I presume that it would cost about as much to keep a custodian specially fitted for the work in charge of it in the Congressional Library as it would over here.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. This, being put in by the Senate, must necessarily be only an offer to the House, because the House has equal rights, and when it comes to conference the matter of salary will be, of course, adjusted according to the views of the House and the Senate, if they can be ascertained. But it is better, if you are to have a custodian, to have the salary included, I think. It might be stricken out in conference.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the chairman of the committee whether this man who is recommended by the Librarian of Congress is now in the service of the Government and employed in the Library of Congress?

Mr. WARREN. I assume that he has been employed, but he has been paid, I think, from the Monetary Commission. As to his exact status to-day I would be unable to tell the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. My thought was that if he is in the employ of the Government in the Library of Congress it is not going to cost us anything more to have him take charge of this library in the Library Building.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If he did he would go back to his old salary and not to the extravagant amount of $2,500 a year.

Mr. WARREN. There is no provision in the bill for his salary except the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is there a provision anywhere for him as an employee of the Congressional Library?

Mr. WARREN. Not that I know of.

Mr. HEYBURN. It seems to me, Mr. President, if those books are as accessible and the custodian is as constantly there to give attention, it would make but little difference, so far as the Members of the Senate are concerned, as to whether they were in the Senate Office Building or in the Library. But my attention is directed more particularly to the completeness of the service of the custodian. Undoubtedly Senators will want to make a very extended use of these books or of that library, or some of them, and they ought to be as available both as to convenience and as to hours as though they were in the Congressional Library. If the House is willing to have that library over here in the Senate Office Building, that is for the House to determine, and I am not going to enter any plea on their behalf, but I am only speaking of the convenience to Senators. I do not know to what extent it has been catalogued, whether as to the subject or merely as to the name of the volume and its place on the shelves, but it should be accessible to Members of both Houses at such hours as would accommodate them in using it.

I repeat, I have given no thought to the question of the custodian, because it would be practically the same for the same service wherever it was. I do not know that the Senate is going to take up the consideration of any financial legislation, but it may do so, and when it does any Senators anxious or willing to enter into a thorough preparation for the consideration of a question of that kind should have the freest access to those books. If we go over there now, I assume that every courtesy is extended and every convenience provided for the use of those books. But whether that custodian will be there during all the hours when they might desire to consult the books is a very important question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked the Senator to yield for the purpose of making this suggestion: It seems to me that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has a total misapprehension of how books may be accessible in a public library. He seems to think that these books ought to be kept together in a batch, the idea being that you or I could go there, look them over, and find out what we want. It does not make a bit of difference in what part of a library building a book is, it is shelved according to certain rules of classification, chiefly topical. The only thing that you need in a batch is the name of the book. If you go over there, for example, you will find the names of books there that were bought by Congress from Mr. Jefferson. Mr. Jefferson's library is in a separate catalogue. You would find after these books went there one of the first things the librarian would do would be to print a list of the books contained in the Monetary Commission library, so you would not go to the shelves, but the names of the books on the shelves, the authors, the topics, would be brought to you. You could send for it to the Library and have it sent to you. The Library over there has, I suppose, a great number of these bibliographies, so that you can get the books that are published upon any subject you want almost by asking the librarian to send you the bibliography upon that subject. For example, if you wanted to write something or study something about Mr. Jefferson, you would ask for a bibliography, and the librarian would send you the Jefferson bibliography, which is this thick [illustrating], I suppose, and it contains the name of every book in the Library ever written about Jefferson. So when you wanted these books you could either send for the bibliography of the Monetary Commission library or you could send for a list of the books upon the subject of banking and currency. That would include those. Then, running down them, you would find what you wanted, and have it sent to your chamber. You could not have that done where that library is now placed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, I think it would be decidedly wise to keep the books together in stacks, so that we would know just exactly where the books that are now in those rooms are and so that those desiring to use them could have access to the stacks for the purpose of looking over the books.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But—one moment more, if the Senator will pardon me—that is totally unnecessary. If the librarian thinks it is necessary or advisable he can do it that way, but it is totally unnecessary. They have this matter so arranged that all I have got to do right now is to sit down and write the name of any book that is in the Congressional Library, together with the name of the author, give it to a page here, and send it over there, and it will be back here in a very short time—I started to say eight minutes; but in a very short time. I might write for three books at the same time. One of them might be in the northwest corner, one of them in the southeast corner, and one in the center of that great Library upon the shelves; but before the man at the desk is a map on which is the name of the stack where a particular book is, and this communication is at once sent to the person in charge of the stack, and the book comes right straight back. It is not a question of keeping books together, but it is a question of being able to get them immediately.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if the Senator will pardon me, one more remark, for I do not want to disturb him again. A Senator asked how many books were there, and I told him that some one had stated to me yesterday, going down upon the car, I think, that there were six or eight thousand. I find by reference to the RECORD of yesterday that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who has a rare faculty for accuracy about details, in reply to a similar question, said:

> There are several thousand volumes; I should judge between eight and ten thousand volumes.

So I should say 6,000 would be a very reasonable estimate of the number of books there. I do not know, however.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that I had never heard stated definitely by anyone the number of books in the library, but it was suggested to me just before making the statement yesterday that there were the number I named in the library.

Mr. President, I wish to say, so that the Senator will understand the matter, that Mr. Slade was recommended by the librarian for the position of custodian of the Monetary Commission's library. His salary was fixed and paid by the Monetary Commission. After the Monetary Commission ceased, Mr. Slade was paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate by order of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and is being paid to-day out of that fund. If he is to continue as custodian of the library an appropriation must be provided in this bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator from Utah what authority—and I am asking purely for information—did the chairman of the Finance Committee have to order the salary paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. By the passage of a resolution authorizing the payment of whatever expense there might be in attending to the business of the committee.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask the Senator if he knows what salary the commission paid?

Mr. SMOOT. They paid Mr. Slade a salary of $2,500 a year.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, what I was addressing my remarks to is not included within the consideration of the salary of this man.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that, Mr. President, but I wish to say to the Senator, if he has no objection, that Mr. Slade at the present time is receiving the same salary that he received before, and the question on which the Senator was speaking was as to how long each day Mr. Slade was in charge of the library.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I was not. I am not discussing Mr. Slade. I am discussing the question of the arrangement of these books.

Anyone accustomed to investigating questions knows that if he had access to the stack he will open a book that promises information and find that it contains none, or at least not what he was seeking, and he will immediately put it back on the stack and look at another book and see whether or not that contains the desired information. In looking up a law question you will stand up in front of your stacks of law books and probably eliminate a dozen from consideration that seem to promise information before you find the one that you want to give consideration to, but that would mean we would be sending for books and having them brought over here merely to ascertain whether they contained any information upon the particular subject. If they are in accessible stacks you will stand in front of those stacks, take down a book and look at it, and perhaps it may contain what you want or it may not. That will obviate the necessity of bringing over a large number of books. Whether that stack is in this room or whether it is in the Congressional Library is not very material, if the hours are so arranged as to make them accessible for that purpose.

I would like to see these books, if they go to the Congressional Library, placed in stacks by themselves, catalogued, and accessible, so that Senators or Members of the other House could go over to the stacks and by a few moments' investigation determine whether they wanted any of the books. While Senators had them sent over here by the dozen or the score for the purpose of finding out whether they wanted them at all other persons in Congress or elsewhere might desire to refer to those same books. The question of convenience is a very important question in disposing of these books.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think, if I read a part of the amendment, the Senator will see that it renders it very easy for the librarian to do just what he wants. This is the language in the latter part of the amendment:

> And the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purpose of removing the books and the present stacks and shelving to the Library of Congress.

All the librarian will have to do will be to set up stacks and shelves, and put in the books, if he thinks that is the best way to make the books accessible to the reading public.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, from experience with libraries and reference to them, we all know that much depends upon the arrangement of the books so far as the availability of the information contained in them is concerned. I really care little whether those books are in their present quarters or in the Congressional Library if the same convenience can be afforded for reference; but if we are to keep these rooms open and keep a custodian there during all the hours the Congressional Library is open we would have to provide for elevator service, and we would have to provide that that custodian should remain there, say until 10 o'clock at night. I undertake to say that any busy Senator would have to defer his investigations until after the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And he would have to remain there while Congress was in session.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And all the elevator service would have to go on all the time.

Mr. HEYBURN. He would undoubtedly have to remain there in and out of session. All that I desire is that the arrangement, whatever it is, shall insure accessibility to those books. My private opinion is that they would be more accessible if they were in designated locations and stacks in the Congressional Library; but if you can make this just as convenient and as complete as possible, I am not otherwise very particular about it.

As I have said, of course you will add to the expense of maintaining the Congressional Library to the extent of whatever it would cost to keep some one whose attention should be given entirely to that stack. If we engage in financial legislation here Senators of necessity will be giving a great deal of attention to that library, if it is what it is claimed to be. If, however, it is made up of a lot of essays written by men who call themselves financiers, as is the case with some of the volumes that I have in my room, I would not bother myself about them; but if there be valuable and reliable statistics or information contained in those books, we will have to be able to find them quickly; to investigate them then and there; and to make such notes and memoranda as are proper, so that when on the floor in the discussion of these questions if you have a reference to a subject and the treatment of a subject you will not have to send for several books in order to determine what you need on the floor.

The Congressional Library has a system, but if it is not a convenient system it is entirely within our power to change it. We can provide that the librarian shall keep this stack together, available, and under the care of a custodian, who can refer you to books that you may need in order that you may run down the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to suggest one difficulty in that connection, if the Senator will pardon me. If we did that, and made the librarian keep this as a separate library within a library, there would have to be a librarian for it, and there would have to be an assistant, because one man can not stay there during all the hours it should be accessible.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He would have to be relieved. If the books take the ordinary course, each one goes to its classified place; and as they are topically arranged, they will probably be all together anyhow; but they would fall within the regular service of the librarian. We would not have to hire another man or woman at the Congressional Library to put six or eight thousand more volumes in that library.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; but they have now assistants whose services are devoted to certain classes of the library.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Absolutely to certain classes. The Senator uses the word "classes" in the sense of the subject matter of the books

Mr. HEYBURN. The subjects matter of the books.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but not somebody to keep a certain territorial area—a library within a library, or a sort of imperium in imperio—but they have certain people who have charge of certain stacks, and those stacks for the most part are topically arranged in connection with matters of this sort. Of course, when you come to fiction, poetry, and literature of that kind, the books are not topically arranged; they are arranged on a different principle. But if you were to provide that this library were to be kept separately over there, you would have to carry along with this library the custodian, or you would have to appoint some other custodian to attend to it, as if it were a sort of separate library, whereas if it is merely carried over and is subjected to the usual rules and treated in the usual way, not another employee will be required.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would not be practicable at all to place these books according to the authors, for instance. They should be arranged according to the topic, "Finance."

Mr. WILLIAMS. They would be so arranged, naturally, anyhow.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then they would be together. The Congressional Library is open on Sundays, and there are some zealous Members of both Houses who find it necessary to do a good bit of that kind of work on Sunday. All I desire is a convenient arrangement that will enable us to have full advantage of whatever this library may present. I do not suppose if there are 8,000 volumes in this Monetary Commission library, that all of them are very important; but we will have to sift them. I like to go into a library with the books on the shelves and with the right to go up to a book, take it down, stand there, and see whether or not it is a book that I want to investigate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, that is a thing that ought never to be allowed in any library.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think a Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nobody ought to go to the stacks or shelves except the employees of the library.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think that is a very inefficient way of arranging a library. I would not think of arranging one under my own control in that way. I must have access to the books on the shelves. They belong to the Senators and Representatives in Congress, and they should not be placed under embarrassing rules where they would have to send to a custodian, and say, "Bring me volume so-and-so, treating on a certain class of finance," and he brings it to you only to take it back again. You should be able to look for it yourself.

I only make these remarks in the interest of a proper arrangement. No lawyer ever handles his library as is suggested here. Any lawyer who knows how to use books has his shelves so arranged that he can look at a book and put it back again without loss of time. But to sit there and say to one of these messengers, "I want volume so-and-so," only to find that you do not want it at all, you would suffer a loss of time; and that would not occur if the investigator went to the shelves and looked at the books himself. You must not have it limited as to hours, for we want the fullest access to the books that can be had. That is all I want.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if it were not for the fact that the question of monetary legislation will be under consideration—if not at this session, more than likely at the next session—I would not care whether the Monetary Commission library now in the Finance Committee room of the Senate should remain there or be transferred to the Congressional Library; but for the very reason the Senator from Idaho has mentioned I believe that it ought to remain where it is, so that whenever the Finance Committee meets for the purpose of considering the framing of legislation affecting our monetary system it can have the reference books right at hand and not wait to send to the Congressional Library for them. We have a custodian who knows every book, and, as I said yesterday, he is peculiarly qualified for the position. He is at the office at 9 o'clock in the morning, and I have often sent there for books at 7 o'clock at night and found him there. I do not think that he remains there later than that, however. The thing for us to consider in this connection is as to whether it will be more convenient for the Finance Committee, in preparing legislation and gathering the necessary information, to have this library in the committee rooms or at the Congressional Library. I believe, Mr. President, with the library as it is, it will be much more convenient for the committee to get such information than if they had to send to the Congressional Library for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will pardon an interruption. Does he not think that the convenience of these books to the members of the committee as against that of the General Legislature is very small ground upon which to base his argument? Does he not think that the books should be available to all Members of the National Legislature? If you are going to have a library in the Finance Committee, because some time that committee is going to consider a monetary bill, then you ought to have in that committee room a library of the tariff—a library of 50,000 volumes. I think there are that many, and most of them are very entertaining, if you have time to peruse them. If we start this business of putting into every committee room a library on the matters under the jurisdiction of each committee, we had better abolish the Congressional Library, which was originally instituted for the very purpose of keeping books that Senators and Representatives wanted, and allow Senators to have in their committee the special books connected with their own work. I do not think that argument ought to have much weight.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Monetary Commission collected this library for the purpose of affording to Congress information to be used in considering legislation with a view of revising our monetary system, and as it was selected it was put into the rooms of the Finance Committee. The stacks are especially fitted for the room. The cases were made to conform to the room.

I do not think they could be used at the Congressional Library.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has now made a little broader statement. The first argument was that it was for the use of the library of the Committee on Finance, and now he has gone back further and says this library was for use in formulating monetary legislation. Does he not think that is too restricted a statement? It was not done solely, nor even chiefly, for the Monetary Commission. The Monetary Commission was not appointed to get this information solely for Members of Congress. This information was to be filtered through Members to all the people of the United States who were concerned in the consideration of the importance of legislation of that sort to the people of the United States. Does he not think it is too restricted a field, that he has taken a too restricted territory in his statement, and that the broader and better ground is that the books ought to be not only accessible for the Finance Committee, but all Senators, and not only all Senators, but all Members of the House of Representatives, and not only all Members of the House of Representatives, but all students and bankers and financiers, and so forth?

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator from Mississippi is wrong when he says it was not collected chiefly for the use of Congress. I think that was the purpose; that it was collected to be used in securing information for the purpose in view of revising our monetary system.

Mr. HEYBURN. May I ask a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand there are chutes running from the Congressional Library to both Houses of Congress, and when we order a book it comes from the Library in a very few minutes. That chute runs to the House as well as the Senate, and if we have information as to what books we shall want during a debate and order them, they can be sent immediately to the Senate. On the other hand, the Senate Office Building is a half mile from the House—I believe that is the distance—and it would necessitate probably the time and expense of sending those books over in the wagons that run to and from the Library.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows there is no chute from the Library to the Senate Office Building nor to the House Office Building, and those are the places where the committees meet. There is a chute running from the Library to the central Dome of this building.

Mr. HEYBURN. But it is available to the Senate and the House, whereas if the suggestion is complied with we will place those books a half mile distant from the House of Representatives and a quarter of a mile from this Chamber, and time must elapse before we can get the books. Perhaps an argument will have been finished or a vote had before the book would be in the hands of the Senator wanting to refer to it.

The use of the books is not of as much importance to the committee as it is to a Senator on the floor, because these questions are thrashed out on the floor, and the present arrangement for sending them quickly to the Capitol is certainly a convenience, and a convenience far greater than would be afforded by having to send them by messenger or by wagon. I think we ought to take that into consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I will further state that if the proposed amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is adopted it will not provide for the salary of the present custodian. I understand he desires that the books be transferred to the Congressional Library, and that the Congressional Library shall hereafter handle the Monetary Commission's library.

Mr. President, I believe the custodian to-day of that library, if it is transferred to the Congressional Library, should go to the Congressional Library and handle this particular library. The librarian sent a letter here this morning, which has been read from the desk, stating that Mr. Slade was at one time an employee of the Congressional Library and is ably fitted for the position now held by him. There is no provision made in any appropriation bill for his salary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this man was formerly employed in the Congressional Library at a small salary; I do not know what; certainly not $2,500. All the Congressional Librarian has to do is to restore this man, if he chooses, to the rolls at his old salary, giving him what he is worth.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that there will be no place for him, as he is not provided for in any appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have never found that there was no place for anybody when the man at the head of things wanted him. I have frequently been unable to find any place when I wanted a man appointed. But if there is a desire on the part of those in power to find a place for him, you can bet 25 tons of gold against a dozen eggs that they can find a place, and at his old salary, too.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] suggests to me that those are rather large odds which I am offering. But it shows my confidence in the proposition; and the odds are not so large because the price of eggs, though the eggs be not completely fresh, has gone up so. If this particular man is wanted, the librarian can take care of him by just putting him back on the roll at his old figure. There will not be a bit of trouble about that. The matter of the custodian can be taken care of, if it is desired to put him back at his old salary—not this salary—and then I imagine nobody would have any objection to offer.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was not here when the letter of the librarian was read. I wondered what happened that the librarian assumed to advise the Senate what it ought to do with reference to business before it. So far as I am concerned——

Mr. SMOOT. I take it for granted the librarian was asked by the chairman for an explanation as to the item under discussion, and that it was in answer to that request that he sent the letter.

Mr. REED. How is that?

Mr. SMOOT. I say I take it for granted that information was requested from the librarian, and in answer to that request he sent the letter.

Mr. REED. I only know what I have heard here in regard to it. The statement was made that a letter from the librarian was read, saying this man was necessary to take charge of these books.

Mr. SMOOT. I never made any such statement.

Mr. REED. That is the way I understand it. What was it sent here for?

Mr. SMOOT. I stated that there was read from the desk a letter from the librarian stating that he recommended this man to the Monetary Commission for the position of custodian of the Monetary Commission's library; that he was peculiarly fitted for the place, and that he also added in the letter that the library as it is now located would be of more or greater advantage to the committee than if transferred to the Congressional Library, although the latter part of this I did not state when the Senator from Missouri entered the Chamber.

Mr. REED. Here is the letter, it just having been handed to me.

Mr. WATSON. How is it addressed?

Mr. REED. To "My dear Senator WARREN." After stating that he had recommended Mr. Slade to the Monetary Commission, in a postscript he adds this:

> I may add that if the project be carried out Mr. Slade would as custodian render a service to Senators and the Senate committees far in excess of the mere care and use of that collection, for his knowledge of the Library of Congress is such that he would constantly draw upon it in their behalf and, in fact, act as an outpost of it.
> Should the collection come to the main Library it could not well be kept separate, but would have to be merged. It would not in this case require the special custodian; on the other hand, its usefulness would be greatly impaired by the lack of one devoted to it, with close knowledge of it, and applying himself to the duty of making it serviceable to Congress.

If that does not constitute a letter of advice to the Senate of the United States with reference to what it ought to do in the matter now being discussed, then I am unable to understand the English language, and I simply rise to remark in language which is plain at least that I regard that as a piece of superlative impudence, wholly unwarranted, and ought not to be tolerated.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask the Senator how he can be consistent when he asks the chairman of the committee for information and then on what he bases his information, if the committee is to be debarred from addressing a communication to a man having charge of some one of the great bureaus or departments of the Government and get an answer in a perfectly deferential way. Is not that inconsistent?

I hold no brief to defend the librarian. He has always wanted more in the appropriation bill than we have been able to give him, but in this matter he can not be blamed, in my judgment, for answering the inquiry I made as to the facts. The question was raised here last night how this man came to be employed. I presumed the librarian knew what is a good and what is a poor man in the way of a custodian. I also asked him what would be the result in sending the books over there. There was no color on the part of the committee in what they desired, nor is there any color in the letter. It merely states the facts. I do not think I ought to sit silent in my place, after having had the letter read, and hear a Government officer charged with impertinence for merely answering a letter requesting information. Where are we to get our information? Where is the committee to get its information if it is debarred from asking the heads of bureaus and heads of departments for it? Are they to answer and say to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations contemptuously, "It is none of your business"?

Mr. REED. If the Senator has concluded his question, I will proceed. The Senator says that he did not send his letter with any color, by which I take it he means he did not ask this man for his opinion, but for facts. It would have been entirely proper for the librarian to have stated that he had recommended Mr. Slade and to have stated that he recommended him because of his experience; it would have been entirely proper for the librarian to have said that if these books came to the Library he could not keep them together, because that would be a mere statement of fact, if it be a fact—a fact, however, which I very much doubt, because I think with a little shifting they could keep all these books together in that great building. But this gentleman does not stop at a statement of fact. He proceeds to tell us what ought to be done, and he seemingly does it without having been asked to advise us, because the Senator says he did not ask him for any coloring. He proceeds to tell us what service this man can render the Senate; in fact, he becomes the advocate of this particular man. No man reading this letter can arrive at any other conclusion, unless he starts out, in my judgment, with a peculiar frame of mind.

I take it this brings us to the very kernel of this whole controversy. It is not a question as to where the books shall be so much as it is a question as to who is to draw the salary of custodian of these books; and, accordingly, after a debate that has lasted now for a day and a half, we find that the appeal put forward by the Senator from Utah that if we do move the books to the Library, where they belong and ought to be, then this particular man should follow the books and the salary should follow the man; and on top of that comes a letter from the librarian recommending this particular man and insisting that he is the one man to have the custody of these books.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator suspend for a moment? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 20182) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who is in charge of the bill, is engaged in a meeting of a conference committee, and at his request I ask that it be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, upon the request of the Senator from Virginia, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. REED. All this battle, in my judgment, is not over whether the books shall be close to the Finance Committee room or whether they shall be in the Senate Office Building or whether they shall be in the Congressional Library, but it is over the question as to whether this particular gentleman shall continue to draw $2,500 a year for sitting in the same room where the books are and looking wise. That is about all there is to it. If it was a special act it ought to be entitled an act to perpetuate this particular man in office and insure him his salary. So we find the librarian, for whatever reason he saw fit to do it, telling us, in effect, that this is the only man who can take care of those books. My experience in life has led me to this conclusion: Whenever you get a job that only one man on earth can fill, you ought to abolish the job and do it quick, because that one man may die and then we would be in an awful situation.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I wish to suggest to the Senator that, so far as the individual man is concerned, I do not suppose that would be a matter of much concern for the librarian in making the suggestion regarding him, because if I understand correctly we furnish the money for the payment of the salary, and the question of the selection of the man rests with him under the present law and not with Congress. So I suppose, as far as that part of it goes, in reference to the particular man, it could not have been with a view of having Congress name that man, because under the law of the land he would have the right to name him, and it would not be necessary for him to come to Congress for that purpose.

I suppose that what was in the mind of the librarian, who, by the way, is a very worthy and efficient officer, was simply the fact that if the books went over there it would be necessary to have some additional force, and though it was not necessary to be done, he named this particular man as one suitable for the work. I say it was not necessary, because he himself could appoint him.

Mr. REED. Possibly, then, he wanted to be frank with the Senate or with certain Senators and let them have the assurance in advance that he had his eye on this man. I am constrained to believe that he is not the only man who has his eye on this particular man.

I say, Mr. President, again, if this position is one that can only be filled by one man, then we ought to abolish it utterly, because if the Lord should gather that man to his fathers this country would be in an awful condition. I know there is one man in this country that the world is certain to resolve itself back into chaos and old night, and all the elements are going to melt with fervid heat, when that man passes away; and the only solace and satisfaction that some of us have lies in the fact that we may die and pass away from this vale of tears before he goes, and the world and all that is therein contained comes to destruction. But I hope that principle will not be extended to the custodian of this library.

There has been a good deal of talk about the importance of having these thousands of volumes. Nobody seems to know how many volumes there are. Nobody has ventured a guess as to whether the number is 1,000 or 10,000. The vast amount of study that has been given to these books is evidenced by the fact that nobody has counted them, and nobody can come within thousands as to the number of them. Nobody is sufficiently familiar with this library to give us any definite notion with reference to that important fact. Yet we are told that the library is so important that it must be near the Commitee on Finance.

It strikes me that we are bordering upon the absurd when we say that the Senate Finance Committee can not consider financial legislation unless next door to it there is a library of so many volumes that nobody has counted them or can come within several thousand of the number there are. Every man here knows that the Finance Committee of the Senate will not get together in its room and undertake to read the books in that library or to examine the books in that library. It may at some time upon some disputed fact have occasion to send for a book, but it is utterly absurd to claim that it will sit there and burrow through these volumes. It may be that as a matter of antiquarian taste and as a mere love of book lore upon the shelves the expenditure of this money was justified. Yet I undertake to say that there never was for all practical purposes a more complete waste of money than when the books were bought, and that there is not a man on this earth to-day, and never will be a man, who will give to that library any exhaustive study, except it be a historian engaged in tracing the history of financial legislation.

I want to say that instead of the Finance Committee getting together to burrow through those books as they threaten to do, they are much more likely to get together on a financial bill as they got together on a tariff bill, to wit, the Republican Members get together in a room, call before them the men interested in financial legislation, to wit, the great bankers and owners of trust companies, and consult them as to their wishes and put their wishes forward in a bill, just as it has been admitted on this floor that different members of the Finance Committee in the past got together with the proprietors of the great protected industries behind locked doors and in secret and wrote the amendments to the Payne-Aldrich bill. That will be the kind of library which they will be consulting. They will be consulting the wishes of the great financial centers of this country as expressed by their mouthpieces, and they will not be hunting through musty tomes and ancient literature that gives us the history of money from the days when they bought by swapping first things, and then some representative of the things, and finally down through all the ages to our present monetary system.

The thing to do is to cut this little graft out of this bill, $2,500 a year to this man to look after these books. I undertake to say that those books will not be inquired after to any considerable extent, and when they are inquired after, tabulated and catalogued as the books are in the library, they can be taken from the shelves by a $900 a year clerk and brought to the desk of any man who wants to read them.

As far as I am concerned I propose to protest upon the passage of this bill against carrying items of this kind.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it strikes me that we have spent a good deal of time over an inconsequential matter, and yet I want to say a word in addition to what has been said.

I regret that the Senator from Missouri has arraigned the Committee on Finance in its method of investigating questions relating to the tariff, and that he looks forward to the same methods which he denounces in the matter of framing a monetary bill. I do not know that we will ever have sane monetary legislation in this country; I have some doubt about it; but I am not going to waste time on that matter. I wish to say just a word or two in connection with the amendment of the committee and the amendment submitted by the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment.

Mr. President, as to the number of volumes in this so-called library I am quite as much at sea as every other Senator. It was stated in debate a little time ago that there are eight or nine thousand volumes, and it has been whispered in my ear within five minutes that there are about 3,000 volumes. I doubt very much whether there are 3,000 volumes or a thousand volumes upon monetary subjects, and if we had a little more time I think I would take the trouble to make a little investigation along those lines. I do not think the library is as important as some people believe it is.

It must be remembered that this library belongs not to the Senate but to both Houses of Congress, and it is a serious question in my mind whether we ought to establish a library in the Senate Office Building that will be open to the three or four hundred Members of the other House. I think that they might well, and I am sure that they will, object to having this library, if it is to be of any practical use, housed in the Senate Office Building, something over a third of a mile from the House Office Building.

It does seem to me that it is but a proposition sensible in every way that these books should be in the Congressional Library, midway between the two Houses, where they could have access to them, where the Senate has a reading room and the House has a reading room palatially furnished, and where I am told Senators and Members seldom are found. But if they desire to investigate these subjects, if these books are in the Congressional Library, they have delightful rooms there where they can go, and they will have an assistant not at $2,500 but at about $900 a year to wait on them. So much for that.

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me just a word?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Also it is true that any Senator can telephone to the Library and they will send him nearly any book on nearly any subject that he wants to examine in his office, or they will furnish it to him here.

Mr. GALLINGER. They come through the pneumatic tube under the Dome here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me one word more, I only wish to express my appreciation of the splendid services that I have always received whenever I have called upon those at the Congressional Library to render me service. For that reason, I should like to have these books there, because I know I can get them quickly and easily if I ever want them.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is not any doubt about that splendid service, and it is at our command. Every request that is made by us is complied with with alacrity. I believe that is exactly what we ought to seek, rather than to have the library housed over here without any facilities such as we enjoy at the present time.

Now, as to the salary of this man, I think there is a good deal of anxiety expressed to take care of this particular man. He was in the employ of the Librarian of Congress at one time. I can not speak with authority as to what his salary was, but if he was such an extremely valuable man I wonder he was not kept there. I have observed that the Librarian of Congress, who is a very independent man, can usually work in a clerk there when he wants to, but he is horrified if a Senator should suggest the propriety of his doing that Senator a little favor. He does not think that that is right. So this man having been in the employ of the Librarian of Congress, if he was so extremely valuable, he ought not to have been separated from the Library of Congress, and if a little additional work is imposed upon the Librarian of Congress in placing this library in that building, I have no doubt but that he can find a place for this man, though not at $2,500 a year, because if you turn to this bill you will find that the Toner Library, which is a much larger library than this, has an attendant at $900. The Washingtonia Library has an attendant at $900 and an assistant, I believe. I do not know the extent of the Smithsonian Deposit, but I think it is a large deposit, and it has a custodian at $1,500. The Congressional Reference Library has a custodian at $1,500 provided for in this bill.

I never saw this man in my life. I presume he is a man of ability, a man of some knowledge of books, but I am not worrying over the possibility of that man's services being dispensed with, because I have no doubt there are a multitude of other men who can do the work just as well as he.

It does seem to me that the persistent efforts to keep this library in the Senate Office Building, where I think it ought not to be, and the suggestion that this man ought to follow the library, have not much force. I remember that we had a railroad in New Hampshire once that frequently changed hands, and it was always said that the rolling stock and a certain number of lawyers went with it; they followed the change; it was a part of the understanding and the program.

Mr. President, I dislike exceedingly to differ even in minor particulars with the committee of which I am a member, but I really think that the suggestion made by the Senator from Mississippi in the amendment he has offered to the amendment will adequately provide for the protection of this library and will secure to the Members in both Houses better facilities than they can possibly enjoy if the amendment of the committee should be agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, as I said yesterday, I agree with what the Senator from Mississippi has said, but the Senate Committee on Appropriations acted in accordance with the Senate joint resolution which the Senate itself passed. It is exactly in accord with the provision inserted by the committee. It passed the Senate, and the committee of the Senate has, in acting upon this appropriation bill, acted in accordance with the current law so far as it can. I made the suggestion just as the Senator has that these books ought to go to the Library, and I shall vote for the Senator's amendment. But I want to show the Senator why the Appropriations Committee acted as it did. Here is a current law that the Senate has already passed; that is, it is a Senate resolution that it passed on March 14, 1912. It provides:

That all books, maps, and other documents now in the possession of the National Monetary Commission be, and they are hereby, transferred to and made a part of the reference library of the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, and said property shall not be disposed of as provided by section 3618 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. BACON. Before what committee was that, if any?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know. All I know is that it is a joint resolution of the Senate that was passed.

Mr. BACON. I want to say for myself, and I presume it is true of other Senators, very frequently we have legislation of that kind on the calendar, and it goes through sometimes when no attention is given to it. I certainly would never have agreed to it at that time if I had known it was before the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. It passed.

Mr. BACON. By whom was it introduced?

Mr. OVERMAN. By the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. CULBERSON. Does the resolution show from what committee it was favorably reported?

Mr. OVERMAN. I only have a copy in my hand. There is nothing to show from what committee it came. It was before the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is it a joint resolution or simply a Senate resolution?

Mr. OVERMAN. A joint resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has it become a law?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know whether it has become a law or not. I know that the Senate acted on it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think it became a law.

Mr. OVERMAN. It went from the Senate, and was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is the House committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. The House committee. It is Senate joint resolution No. 88 and passed the Senate, and is now pending before the Committee on Banking and Currency in the House of Representatives. But that was the action of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I understood the Senator to say that it was a House resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I said it was a Senate joint resolution, S. J. Res. 88, but it is in the House of Representatives, having passed the Senate, and it is now before the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It had to be passed by both Houses before it could be a law.

Mr. OVERMAN. I say the Senate took action on the joint resolution. In that we did not go as far as the Senate Committee on Appropriations did. But if the Senate desired the books to be kept there, we provided they should be kept there until otherwise ordered, and made provision for one year. The committee acted upon the idea that the Senate had acted upon the question and desired to have them kept there. I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi transferring the books to the Congressional Library.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I just want to say one word without detaining the Senate long. I entirely agree with the suggestion that this library should go to the Congressional Library for a great many reasons, which I will not repeat, although satisfactory to me. I think it would be highly improper in view of the fact that the House has its joint interest in the property that it should be kept in the Senate Office Building, and I think it would be highly undesirable on account of the inconvenience of those who are particularly interested in the Senate Office Building to have it there.

I think it proper to say one word with reference to this letter from the librarian. I do not entirely agree with my friend from Missouri in the view he takes of it. We have rather had occasion to complain that officers in the different departments have not been as ready as we sometimes thought they should have been to give us the information which we desired. I am not disposed to criticize an officer when he responds promptly to an inquiry made to him either in the name of the Senate or by an individual Senator, even though he may have in some particular gone outside of the response required to the immediate inquiry.

I do not believe that the librarian intended to be officious in the matter. I do not agree with him at all in the suggestion that the library officer now in charge of this library should be transferred with the library, and what I say is not in defense of that proposition. I disagree with him in that regard. I think these books ought to be sent to the Library, to be treated like any other books that belong to the Library; and if the increased labor imposed by the presence of those books is such as to demand an increased force, it will be brought to the attention of Congress in the proper way; but I do not think that an officer, even though he may give us views with which we do not agree, is to be considered as endeavoring to unduly communicate with Congress when he responds promptly to an inquiry made to him as in this instance by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I think, as I said, he is a very worthy and efficient officer. I am not in a position to judge whether he is open to the criticism which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] made upon him, but I say, as far as his duties as a librarian are concerned, I have been impressed with the fact that he is a very superior and efficient officer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I concur in what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has said, and I am glad to hear the fact stated by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] that the librarian is disposed to be somewhat independent when Senators ask him for the appointment of positions in the Library. I think it would be a deplorable condition if the librarian were disposed to yield pleasantly when Senators ask for positions upon his Library staff.

If there is one place in the Government where it has been shown that patronage is abused it is that patronage under the control of the Senate. There is hardly a place in the Government service where there are so many men occupying positions approaching to the standard of the sinecure. I think the Senators of the United States have not shown themselves to be admirable as advisers to an administrative officer in filling appointive positions. If the librarian is to conduct the Library in the interest of the public service and is to secure full service for the salaries earned, he ought not to be subject to the influence of every Senator in the awarding of positions, and he certainly ought not to be partial to particular Senators.

I am glad to hear that the librarian has shown independence and in the selection of his staff and in the appointment to positions has not yielded to senatorial influence. I consider that a certificate of good character rather than a just criticism.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before we go further I want to make a statement to the Senate in the hope that it may lead to some stress being brought on the proper quarter to do what we all agreed substantially yesterday that we wanted to do, and passed over the provision.

A Representative in the other House this morning left this telephone message for me: "He states that there are 10 or 12 census employees working in the Maltby Building, and that Director Durand"—this is the Director of the Census—"says he can move them to the Census Bureau if necessary; in fact, he intends to move them there in the near future."

He also states in the same telephone message: "That on referring to the Book of Estimates, it will be ascertained that the appropriation for miscellaneous items for the Maltby Building has not varied over $2,000 in 10 years."

That leads me to this: I believe that if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations were to request the Director of the Census to move his men out of the Maltby Building back into the Census Building as soon as he could, it would be done within a week, showing us what has occurred here in the Senate, you understand. A part of the message also was—the clerk told me he failed to take it down—that the director said he could make room for them in the Census Building.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction whatever over the Maltby Building, except to provide for the appropriation. The Committee on Rules has charge of that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not suggest that the Committee on Appropriations had such jurisdiction. I merely suggested that if you were to drop a note calling the attention of the Director of the Census to what had occurred here, that the fact of these census employees being there necessitated our keeping elevator people and everybody else in there all the time, and that you had been informed by a statement of mine in the RECORD, founded upon a statement made to me by Representative JOHNSON of South Carolina—I might just as well name him—I think the Director of the Census would move them out in a week.

Mr. WARREN. Is that the Representative JOHNSON who is chairman of the subcommittee who prepared this legislative bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know. It is Representative JOHNSON of South Carolina.

Mr. CULBERSON. He is the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator, then, that that Member of the House will have his opportunity when the matter commes to conference, as he will undoubtedly be in charge of the conferees on the House side, and those things can be composed there. There are other employees besides those of the Census Bureau in that building. It seems to me, in view of the fact that there are some of those employees, as was stated yesterday, employed here on the floor or at the doors of the Senate and in other places, that we ought not to wipe out that appropriation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I was trying to get at was this: The one real reason why we have to maintain anybody in the Maltby Building now is because some of the census employees are there at work, and I think somebody said some Senate commission or committee was there.

Mr. WARREN. There are numerous persons there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A part of the Pension Committee, I think. They can be moved, of course, at once. If that is done, we shall lock the whole thing up, discharge the elevator attendants, the custodians, and the remainder of the employees and sell the building.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to say a single word in response to the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I know the Senator from Nebraska did not intend to apply what he said to me directly, although he did not quite comprehend what I had in mind, as he naturally would not.

About 14 years ago I joined with my then colleague, Senator Chandler, to ask for a position in the Congressional Library for a man who had been State librarian of the State of New Hampshire. He was given a small position and I think is still employed there. He was a competent man. From that time to the present I have not asked the librarian to appoint anyone from my State and probably never shall. I have given two or three letters, perhaps, to parties not residents of New Hampshire, some of whom came with a request from my colleagues to give them a word of commendation, and I ventured to do that. I do not know that it influenced the librarian one way or the other, and I would not expect that it should.

What I more particularly meant to lay stress on was the fact that I have reason to believe the librarian finds it in his power, and that he exercises his right, to give places to parties that very likely are competent in that great institution and that there is no obstacle in his way of doing that when he desires to do it. For that reason I felt that there would be no obstacle in the way of his giving a position to this gentleman, who is now in charge of the so-called Monetary Commission library. That is all I meant to say.

The Librarian of Congress is, beyond question, a very competent man; he is administering the affairs of that great institution with great ability. He came here recommended in the highest possible terms from the public library at Boston, where they always try to get the best. I had no purpose of reflecting in an improper way upon that official at all.

Now, Mr. President, if the chairman of the committee will permit me, I should like to ask him to go back, because I was detained from the Senate on yesterday, to an item on page 12, contained in lines 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11. I only wish to ask a question about it. That clause reads:

For rent of warehouse for storage of public documents for the Senate, $3,600, to be immediately available, and authority is hereby given to use any part or all of said sum for moving documents contained in said warehouse to buildings owned by the Government.

I have noticed in reading this bill—in fact, I noticed it when the bill was before the committee—that we are paying immense rentals in the District of Columbia. I think I am not mistaken, certainly not if the statement was correct that was submitted to the committee, that there is one building in this District that was hired by the District government year after year for $8,000, the owners claiming they ought to have $10,000 and always saying that the Government owed them $10,000 each year, but nevertheless they receipted in full. I say that building, if I am not mistaken, is now being rented to a department of the Government for more than twice that amount.

It has often occurred to me that if some Senator or some committee of the Senate or of both Houses would take hold of this matter of rented buildings in the District of Columbia, ascertain their value, and ascertain what a fair rental would be, they would astonish themselves and astonish Congress in view of the developments they would find. I may be wrong about it, but that is my impression.

Here is the item for the rental of a warehouse for the storage of public documents. When we erected the Senate Office Building—and I chanced to be on that commission, and my distinguished friend the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] was the chairman of it—we were told that the lower story of that building, especially on the C Street side—you will remember the building slopes down to C Street—would provide ample facilities for storing, I think, all the documents certainly of the Senate. I know that that entire floor is empty, or comparatively so; and unless there is some valid reason for not using it for storage purposes it does seem to me that we ought not to pay $3,600 a year rental for storing public documents for the Senate. I want to ask my distinguished friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, if he has at all looked into the matter of the possibility of storing all these documents in the Senate Office Building on the lower floor?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the most of yesterday was spent in a debate of that subject. It seemed that the lower floor of the Office Building, which was prepared for documents and had steel beams put under it, has been apportioned to Senators, and they now occupy the room, or nearly all of it, that was intended for documents. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who is a member of the Committee on Rules and who, I believe, is the chairman of the subcommittee in assigning rooms to the minority, reported quite fully upon that subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not mean the floor that is No. 1, but the floor underneath.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Which is half above ground.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; it is half above ground.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And amply suited for documents.

Mr. WARREN. On one side it is not only not half above, but it is one and one-half below the ground.

Mr. GALLINGER. On the C Street side.

Mr. WARREN. If you go into the cellar, of course it is another proposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. I mean the lower floor, you may call it the cellar, but I would not call it that, exactly; it is a basement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The end of the building toward the depot is, even as a basement, about half above the ground.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I was not present yesterday, and hence I did not hear the debate. I have not had time to read the RECORD, which I usually try to do, but frequently fail. However, I call attention to this, and more particularly for the reason that I am profoundly of the opinion that the Government is paying exorbitant rentals in the District of Columbia. Perhaps it is my duty as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, although it is a governmental matter, to make an inquiry, rather than that of any other Senator; but I think it is a matter that might be inquired into very carefully. I believe I heard it whispered when I was on my feet that some Senator had made such an investigation, but I know of my own knowledge that the owners of the buildings in the District of Columbia are doing exactly what the owners of buildings everywhere else would do; they are getting just as high a rent as they can for their buildings, and I question very much whether as great care is being exercised in that matter as would be if we were purchasing buildings.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is not the Government to-day paying very much greater prices for some buildings than they were rented for prior to the time they were rented to the Government? In other words, has not the District of Columbia itself rented some buildings, then gave them up, and subsequently the Government has rented them for about twice the original rental?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I suggested a moment ago. That, I think, is an accurate statement. I want the owners of buildings in the District of Columbia, of course, to get a fair return upon their investment; that is proper; but I do not think the poor old Government, which, of course, has not many friends, should be imposed upon to an undue extent in this matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In confirmation of what the Senator is saying—of course, neither he nor I like to base our action upon rumors; we want proof—but not long ago some one pointed out to me a building here that is now being rented by the Government. The building was owned by a florist and it used to be rented by a private individual—I have forgotten now by whom—and my friend said to me that the Government was paying four times as much rent for that building as the previous tenant had paid. So that upon yesterday I suggested that there should be a joint committee of the two Houses—not one of these commissions, but a joint committee—to try to ascertain, first, how much the Government was paying, and, secondly, not alone what department or bureau entered into the contract, but what particular flesh-and-blood man represented the Government in making the agreement, so that if we find any fraud, or stuff like that, we will know the man to punish and not place the blame in the wrong place; and then to find out how the rent paid by the Government for premises compares with the rent paid by others for the same or for similar premises in the District of Columbia.

I had intended, I will say to the Senator, almost at the beginning of the session to introduce a resolution to that effect and have it referred to the appropriate committee, my notion being that members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the Senate and members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the House of Representatives should form a joint committee for the purpose of determining the question; but it escaped me later on in doing other things, and I never thought of it again until yesterday, when we were running over this bill. I should be very glad if the Senator would introduce a resolution of that sort, because, coming from him, and moreover from his side of the House, it would have much more easy sailing than if it came from me or from my side. It ought to be done; there is no doubt about it. I am afraid—I hate to use the word—but I am afraid there is graft going on and that men—I do not mean the bureaus or the departments, for they are not flesh and blood, but somebody acting for them—either receive a bonus or receive some benefit in some way from this abuse, and I am persuaded that the abuse exists.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will be glad to confer with the Senator about the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator know how much the Government is paying annually for rent now?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know the aggregate amount, but I think the chairman of the committee probably has the information.

Mr. WARREN. I have it here, and every Senator can have it if he will look in the Book of Estimates. Every piece of property that the Government rents is included in that publication.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will ask what is the aggregate amount?

Mr. WARREN. The aggregate amount is $586,274.74.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was the information I had received.

Mr. WARREN. Of which the District of Columbia is paying $44,360. I suggest to my colleague on the committee that he might look at that some time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I am not subject to criticism from the Senator from Wyoming on this matter. I would make no distinction as to the District of Columbia. If the District authorities are renting buildings they ought not to rent or paying too high rentals, I should be in favor of calling them to account.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I obtained the figures five hundred and eighty odd thousand dollars, and then I was told by a Member of the other House that there were other rentals in the District of Columbia in other directions that would really carry the total up to over $800,000. I have not any accurate information to support that statement, and I think it is probably a mistake.

Mr. WARREN. There is no doubt about that, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That it is a mistake?

Mr. WARREN. Yes. It is bad enough as it is. The present chairman of the Appropriations Committee has for years been seeking to remedy this condition, not only by urging the construction of our own buildings, but in trying to secure lower rents. I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], my colleague on the committee, that the subcommittee spent the greater part of one day and a good deal of one night in figuring upon this very problem which now at this late time he brings up—the matter of $3,600 for the rent of the building where these documents are stored and their removal. It is a matter that we spent several hours on a year ago, and we had the Superintendent of the Capitol and the Sergeant at Arms before us, and undertook to formulate some plan whereby this appropriation could be obviated. The wording "for the removal of books" was put in at my suggestion, so that we might have them moved into the office building; but the Committee on Rules and the Sergeant at Arms informed me that they have listened to the importunities of Senators who desired those rooms, and it is not an easy proposition to walk up to a Senator and say, "Get out of this room; they want to fill it with documents." So we have once more, hoping it may be the last time, put in this $3,600 item, so that it can be used for moving the documents or for paying rent.

I will say in this connection that it is the cheapest rent per square foot by a very large percentage that the Government is paying. We hope this trouble will not occur again, but there will have to be some self-denial practiced on the part of those who are now using the Senate Office Building if we get all these public documents in there.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Wyoming will pardon me, it was not with reference to the item of $3,600 that I rose, but in reference to the item of $580,000 paid for rental of buildings in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WARREN. I understood that, but the Senator from New Hampshire stated that he was not here yesterday, and I wanted to give him the substance of what was said then.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not true that a considerable portion of that $580,000 consists of rentals for properties arranged for by the departments without coming directly to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me, it would only take a moment to insert in the RECORD what each department is paying out for rent; and when the Senator from New Hampshire is through, I shall be glad to insert the figures.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should be very glad if the Senator would read them, because I think it would help the departments to obtain a reasonable rental if it were known that an investigation was in prospect.

Mr. WARREN. With the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire, I shall give the figures:

The State Department, $11,480; Treasury Department, $52,000; War Department, $15,220; Quartermaster's Department, United States Army, $45,377.10; Navy Department, $40,326.24; Interior Department, $59,100; Post Office Department, $48,455; Department of Agriculture, $85,329; Department of Commerce and Labor, $87,581.24; Department of Justice, $31,580.40; United State Commerce Court, $11,772; United States Court of Customs Appeals, $7,000; Interstate Commerce Commission, $41,000; Public Printer, $5,093.76; and the District of Columbia, $44,360.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator one question——

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator would like, I can give the particulars for the District of Columbia as they are given here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the Senator this question: I notice that the Public Printer is paying out money for the rent of a building——

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He has the old Printing Office, and we built him a magnificent great new building, covering two squares, I believe. Does the Senator recall what he is renting an additional building for?

Mr. WARREN. I am not able to inform the Senator, but I imagine that it is for storage purposes for public documents, printer's supplies, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is for warehouses used in connection with the Public Printing Office; and the $3,600 item that is mentioned in this very amendment is part of the $5,000 that is paid out by the Government Printing Office for rent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me a moment——

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to express my very cordial approval of the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi. I do hope that the Senator from New Hampshire will move that a joint committee on this subject be appointed to look into the matter and make suggestions as to what we ought to do, preparatory to lessening this enormous expenditure for rent. Coming from the Senator from New Hampshire, in view of his long service, no one will feel that it is intended as a reflection upon any particular person, but simply a business proposition and a business effort to make a saving where we ought to make it, if it can be done.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I owe the Senate an apology for calling attention to this matter, which it seems was discussed at great length on yesterday, and I owe the chairman of the committee an apology for not having taken it up when the committee was considering the bill. I have been laboring under some handicaps, from the fact that I have a great deal of work in connection with other bills, especially a conference upon an appropriation bill, and this matter escaped my attention, or, rather, the item had been passed upon before I attended a meeting of the committee, and I ought to have looked into the RECORD and noticed that this matter had been discussed on yesterday, as I am told, at great length.

Another thing has impressed me along the same line as this matter under discussion, and that is, that it does not make very much difference how many public buildings we construct in the District of Columbia, immediately some department wants more room. I think if a committee is appointed it might well devote part of its time likewise to looking into the several departments and ascertaining if they could not economize more. I think that we might do a public service in that regard. However, so far as that is concerned, I will talk with the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Georgia, and, while I do not think that I necessarily ought to introduce a resolution of this kind, I will be glad to cooperate with them in the matter.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say, and, as I remarked a moment ago, perhaps I owe the Senate an apology for going back and raising any question about this matter. I am not posing here as an economist, and yet there are some things in the administration of public affairs that appeal to me very strongly. I think we are inclined in this age to run riot in certain directions in the line of extravagance that we might curb if we took a business view of these public questions. All I care to do is to try to correct any evils that may exist and save the Government some money.

Some years ago there was a proposition to purchase a certain building in the District of Columbia. I will not go into the particulars, but the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] in conjunction with myself took up that matter and made a careful investigation. We found that the amount named in the bill was just about twice the value of the building, and, while I made some enemies on account of the position I took about that matter, we did defeat the proposition and saved that money to the Government. I think the building is now being rented to the Government, and I presume at a good round rental, although I do not know.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question about an item which I notice under the head of "Capitol police."

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator excuse me a moment? I simply wish to say, in regard to what the Senator from New Hampshire has said, that there is no apology due me whatever and that there was no criticism of him intended on my part; I merely desired to lay before him the facts.

I hope the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia may be effectuated and that the Senator from New Hampshire may take up the matter of the rental of buildings. There is always room for improvement.

Referring to the building which it has been said it was proposed to buy at twice its value, that is one of the difficulties we encounter; and here is another: Some years ago we undertook, so far as the Senate was concerned, to purchase the Census Building. We were unable to get the proposition accepted by the House or through conference, and there never has been a time since when we could buy that same building for anywhere near the small sum for which it could then have been purchased. It could not be bought to-day for twice the sum then asked. So that the difficulties of the Appropriations Committee multiply in whatever direction we may seem to go. If we want to buy a building there must be graft somewhere, in the minds of the suspicious; there must be something wrong, and we lose the opportunity. The judgment of a committee, after a careful examination of the facts, may be that we ought to buy; but we are met with the statement that there must be some graft in it.

When we come to the matter of rentals, we have to deal with the different departments—the War Department, on the one hand, the Agricultural Department, on another, and so forth; and it is very hard for Congress, and certainly it is difficult for a committee of Congress, to prevent the rental of any building until such time as the Senate and House have passed upon the proposition and determined what amount should be paid. I assume there must be overpayments in some cases, and I know that in some others which we have investigated we are renting at a lower rate than others, private parties, are paying; but I presume the average is somewhat higher, as the Senator has said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Wyoming in charge of the bill. I notice under the head of "Capitol police" there is 1 lieutenant and 34 more privates provided for than are provided for in the bill as it came from the House. How does the provision of the bill as proposed to be amended by the Senate committee compare with this year's law? Did the House cut the number?

Mr. WARREN. The House cut the number a little more than half. In other words, they did not leave the number provided in the current law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does this bill as it is now propose an increase over the present law?

Mr. WARREN. The Senate has restored the number to cover those now on duty. That is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has but kept up the number?

Mr. WARREN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know whether it was an increase or a restoration.

Mr. WARREN. It is no increase whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is simply a restoration.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he does not think we could dispense with half of these policemen? I notice sleepy-headed officers sitting around that never would be allowed in a real business institution. They are of no use to anybody, even themselves, except to draw their salaries. That, I think, is of personal knowledge to every Senator. Why pension them in this manner?

Mr. WARREN. If those employed here and there are pensioned, it is a different understanding than what I have. I understand that every one of them is on duty. But there are 24 hours in the day, and under the law and custom such employees are on duty 8 hours of each 24. So it takes three shifts. There are various places where, as the Senator from West Virginia says, they may be sitting at these doors where they must necessarily watch the incoming and the outgoing, but there has to be a watch on account of the liability of fire or accident, and therefore these policemen are watchmen as well. If it is thought that this building and grounds can go without guards and without sufficient police, there will be no captious opposition to their going on behalf of the committee or of myself, although I think they should all be retained. If we have all been wrong here for a hundred years, and if it requires nobody to watch the building, well and good. We had a valuable Senate painting quite recently carved up.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Notwithstanding the 67.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator wants to know my opinion, I believe we could better afford to have a sufficient watch on the Capitol than to take the chance we would run without it.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss the number of policemen provided for in this bill, but I do want to make an inquiry in reference to the compensation of the policemen.

The Senator probably feels, as I do, that if there is any criticism which can be made on the legislative bill, it is in relation to the apportionment of salaries. We divide clerks into classes—A, B, C, and D—and we pay them salaries according to the class they may be placed in, without reference whatever to the work that is performed in that particular class. The result is you have at a table one employee working for $900 a year, or for 11 months, and you have working at the same table another clerk receiving $1,400, doing exactly the same kind of work. That certainly is an inartistic method of distribution of salaries. I believe that all salaries should be based upon the character of work done and the skill necessary to do that work.

I appreciate, however, that that is a difficult problem to be solved by the committee. But what I especially want to call the Senator's attention to is this: We are paying in our departments, on the average, I believe, for the labor of women, about $1,200 per year. As a rule there are perhaps three or four in nearly every family receiving these salaries. So that it makes a very good family salary.

I have always believed that as a rule a man's position in life is to be the provider. I believe he should have a salary or earnings sufficient to care for a family, and I believe if there should be any differentiation at all in salaries it ought to be in favor of the man who is compelled not only to take care of himself, but also to take care of others. The Capitol policemen as well as the policemen throughout this city are men mostly of middle age, mostly married men, mostly men of families, and when I compare the salaries allowed to them with the salaries of clerks doing copying, and so forth, it raises naturally an inquiry in my mind why the policeman, who is required not only to do very hard service at times, but who is supposed to be alert, who is supposed to be patient and enduring, should have a salary of only a thousand and fifty dollars a year to care for himself and his family while the average girl in a department receives $1,200 a year and has to care for herself only.

I do not agree with the Senator who preceded me with reference to these policemen. I believe the policemen in the city of Washington and in the Capitol are not only the equal but the superior of policemen elsewhere, and I also believe this force is one of the poorest paid, and this is a city where the cost of living is exceedingly high.

I notice there are two amendments in the provision between line 8 and line 15. The amendments are made necessary by reason of adding to the number of policemen, and while we are supposed to be considering only committee amendments, in the corrections and amendments increasing the amount, there will be a necessary amendment to the sum total. I at least am going to move to modify them, and I will place it in a single motion, if there is no objection.

I move to strike out "$1,800," where it appears on line 8, page 13, and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000"; upon the same line, strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,600"; strike out "$1,200," in line 9, and insert "$1,600"; and in line 10, strike out "$1,050" and insert "$1,500."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to suggest that by unanimous consent amendments of the committee were first to be considered on this reading of the bill, and until they are disposed of——

Mr. McCUMBER. But the amendment proposed by the committee can also be amended; and I will explain it. This is an amendment by the committee, and therefore an amendment to its amendment would be in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The amendment by the committee applies only to the number of officers, not to their salaries.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no. It applies to their number, and that affects the total amount of the salaries. If we were to adopt the amendment we have a certain number at $78,150, and if that is fixed it would require a second amendment in order to raise any of the salaries of the policemen preceding.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota goes to a subject that the amendment of the committee does not apply to—the amount of the compensation of each one of these men. He proposes to go into a new subject matter and change the salary paid to each man, and it would seem to me clear that it reaches a different subject than that to which the amendment of the committee applies.

Mr. WARREN rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. That could not be right. I will endeavor to make this perfectly clear. Suppose there were adopted the amendment of the committee in line 13, striking out "$41,250" and inserting "$78,150." Then the bill, before being reported to the Senate, is further amended by striking out the words "one thousand eight hundred" and inserting in lieu thereof "two thousand." You will then readily see that this amendment does not stand alone, but is dependent upon any other amendment within that paragraph. Therefore, if you amend any portion of that paragraph, fixing either the number or the sum total, it makes it proper that you should amend it as a part of the committee amendment before the matter goes from the Committee of the Whole and before the Senate.

The Senator certainly will see that if he will stop to consider for a moment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand the position of the Senator. I think it is a mistake to agree by unanimous consent to consider committee amendments alone, and in the future as to any bill in which I am interested I shall object to that course. There should be opportunity to offer other amendments to perfect a particular section before we pass from it, because while we are considering it we should consider all subjects related to it. It would lessen the consumption of time——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator knows that that is not a parallel case.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suppose there is a practice in the Senate, with which I am not familiar, and whatever that practice is it ought to be followed in this instance. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is much more familiar with the subject than I am.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest that the orderly way would be first to determine the number of employees, second the salaries, and third the total.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is right.

Mr. WARREN. That being true, I ask the Senator to state his amendment; then we shall proceed with the reading of the section, and then perfect the Senate amendments so far as they go.

Mr. McCUMBER. I agree entirely with the Senator and I did state——

Mr. WARREN. I did not wish to take the Senator off the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; that is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Michigan in the chair). The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the unanimous-consent agreement of yesterday.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand the unanimous-consent agreement, and I agree with the Senator from Wyoming that the orderly way to consider these amendments would be first to consider the number of officers; second, the salary; and third, the total. Now, the committee moves to amend the total. The Chair will quickly perceive that if we adopt that amendment, then a motion would not be in order to amend any of the others while the bill was in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in all appropriation bills the totals are not taken as final. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that on May 28, 1896, Statutes at Large 29, page 148, this rule was adopted:

> That hereafter the total amount appropriated in the various paragraphs of an appropriation act shall be determined by the correct footing up of the specific sums or rates appropriated in each paragraph contained therein unless otherwise expressly provided.

In other words we could go through an appropriation bill, make changes, and if for some reason the footing was not properly changed, it would not affect the appropriation in the least. That has been the rule of the Senate ever since 1896, and generally I will say there is a motion made that all footings be corrected by the clerks.

Mr. WARREN. Usually the Senator in charge of an appropriation bill makes such a request and it is granted—that all footings shall be corrected by the clerks.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not the issue here at all. It is this: The Senate as in Committee of the Whole now proposes to adopt an amendment in line 13, on page 13. Now, if they passed that total and did not ask that it be inserted until we have determined what the salary shall be, that would be applicable; but now as in Committee of the Whole we are reaching that amendment, and that amendment fixes the total. Suppose we vote for an amendment and it is adopted, and then afterwards we adopt another amendment fixing the salary of any one of these officers for a greater amount, then the total remains as it is, inaccurate and improper. The orderly and proper way is that which has just been suggested by the Senator from Wyoming, to complete first the number and the salaries and then adopt your total, or else allow the total to be passed over until we can vote on the other question.

Mr. SMOOT. The only amendments that are being considered now, under the unanimous-consent agreement, are committee amendments. The committee has made no amendment to the salary, but it has made an amendment as to the number. When the committee amendments are adopted or disapproved of, then the Senator from North Dakota can offer any amendment as to the number or as to any salary and have it acted upon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Utah will permit a suggestion, it is this: If the Senator from North Dakota is right in his view that justifies him in moving an amendment anywhere prior to the total being fixed, the fact that some change in the total has to be made will practically do away with the unanimous-consent agreement of the Senate and open up everything.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not take up any further time in debate. We were on this bill all day yesterday and up to this hour to-day, and we have disposed of but a few pages of it. I simply desire to say I am willing to have passed over the amendment, which I purpose to make, until we reach the matter. But right now I do not wish it to be understood that I agree with the proposition that when the committee has made an amendment that that amendment can not be further amended upon the suggestion of any Senator under the unanimous-consent agreement, for it certainly can.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am sorry there are not more Senators in the Chamber, but I think I ought to state briefly how this question has come up.

Last year the Committee on Accounts on the House side recommended that the police force be cut in two and that the appropriation for those who were cut off should be covered back into the Treasury. I do not know whether it received the sanction of the caucus or not. That is a matter, of course, about which I am not informed. But it did not seem to receive attention in either the Committee on Rules or the Committee on Appropriations, but in an informal way representatives of the Committee on Accounts visited me; I referred them to the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate; but they stated that the committee did not seem to want to discuss it. So I appointed a subcommittee, consisting of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who took up that subject and sifted it from top to bottom.

The decision then was that we could not act favorably upon what the Committee on Accounts had recommended, and it has gone on until now.

The committee on the other side have cut the 67 policemen down to 33 for the House and Senate. They are appointed by the Sergeant at Arms of the House and the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate jointly, and I think the Senator from Rhode Island, for his subcommittee, ought to give the Senate the benefit of the tables they made, so the Senate and the country, for that matter, may know exactly what these men do and where they are stationed. Then if the Senate feels it can get along with half of these policemen, it will act upon full intelligence.

So I shall ask the Senator from Rhode Island to give us the benefit of his research.

Mr. WETMORE. Mr. President, as has already been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, a year ago he appointed a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and myself to take this matter of the Capitol police into consideration. I think we have sifted it pretty thoroughly, and have come to the conclusion that the police force can not properly be reduced. We must take into consideration, in the first place, that the Capitol Building has cost about $17,000,000, is not fireproof, and is uninsured both as to building and contents. The building is very large—750 feet in length by 350 feet in width. In addition, the grounds about the Capitol are in area about 59 acres. The chief of the Capitol guides states that sightseers and persons having business here, to the extent of about a million people, go through the Capitol Building each year.

The Capitol police are allowed 50 days' annual leave, when the sessions of Congress will permit, and, in addition, sick leave, in the discretion of the Sergeants at Arms of the House and the Senate.

The police are employed 8 hours a day, 365 days a year, including Sundays. The 50 days' leave, therefore, is not quite equal to the fifty-two Sundays that other employees receive with pay.

I have here a list showing the shifts and assignments of the Capitol police force.

There are 15 stations, manned night and day with 3 men each on 8-hour shifts. These 15 stations require 45 men.

For day service only there are 13 stations—1 man at each station.

For night service only there are 2 stations—1 man for each.

Attached to the headquarters, day service, are 3 men.

On special duty for day service there are 4 stations, requiring 4 men.

The reserve, not assigned, consists of 5 men.

At the present time there is 1 vacancy. This makes up the total of 73 men.

All of the men on day service work from 9 a. m. until Congress adjourns. They not only work the regular eight hours, but remain on duty as long as Congress is in session.

The number of entrances to the Capitol is 17. Twelve of these are unguarded and 5 are guarded. Now, I have here a diagram of each of the stories of the Capitol—basement, first story, and so forth—and on this diagram is marked the station of every man. The list I have in my hand shows the stations, the number of men required to man the stations, the location, and the service, whether regular or not.

In addition to that, I have another sheet which shows exactly what is the duty of every man at each of these stations. It is rather long. I can read it, if the Senate desires.

I have also another list in my hand, which shows the names of every member——

Mr. WATSON. I should like to inquire if the statements show to what Senators these men are charged?

Mr. WETMORE. No; I have not that, but that is very easily ascertained.

Mr. WATSON. I think it would be well to get that information if we can.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Are these men charged to Senators, or are they selected on the basis of efficiency and as a result of some kind of a competitive examination?

Mr. WETMORE. I take it these men are included within what is termed Senate patronage, although I do not know. It would make no difference whether they are or not, because this number of men is needed.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. WETMORE. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. Did the committee inquire in any way into the efficiency of these men?

Mr. WETMORE. I take it for granted, unless complaints are made, that they are efficient men. I have had no complaints brought to my attention.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask the Senator what is the police force of an average city of 75,000 people?

Mr. WETMORE. I think, Mr. President, it is necessary to have an adequate force to properly protect the Capitol Building, preserve order, and prevent vandalism. The building is open to the public, and a very great number of people visit it while Congress is in session as well as during the summer recess.

Mr. WATSON. I think the building should be well policed, but I think there is an unnecessary number of inefficient men around this building, as I think every Senator will agree.

Mr. WETMORE. If the Senator from West Virginia can point out any place where a man can be spared, I shall be glad to aid him.

Mr. WATSON. I can point out some perfectly useless men acting as policemen around this building.

Mr. WETMORE. Would you give me a list of useless men?

Mr. WATSON. I can do it very readily.

Mr. WETMORE. With their names?

Mr. WATSON. I do not know their names.

Mr. WETMORE. You can easily determine that, I take it.

Mr. WATSON. I do not think any Senator will disagree with that statement.

Mr. WETMORE. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator spoke of a million people visiting the building. I suppose he meant in 12 months. He did not state within what length of time.

Mr. WETMORE. During a year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WETMORE. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that the Senator have this matter published in the RECORD.

Mr. WETMORE. I should like to have it inserted in the RECORD. I prepared these tables in order that they might be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not heard the Senator make that request yet.

Mr. WETMORE. I make the request now. I ask that the tables and figures I have may be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator said we could very easily get the information as to how these men were appointed, and upon whose recommendation. Where could we get it?

Mr. WETMORE. I suppose from the Sergeant at Arms of the House and the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate. I may state as to the positions that were to be made vacant on the House side, where it was not thought necessary to have so many people to take care of the building, all those places have been filled.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should not be at all surprised.

Mr. WETMORE. I do not suppose anyone should be surprised.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would not be at all surprised if twice as many places, if allowed by law, would be filled on that side and on this side too; and I should not be a particle surprised if about 40 per cent of the men who filled them were absolutely inefficient, hangers on of Democratic Representatives and Republican Representatives, and Democratic Senators and Republican Senators. I do not see what that has to do with it, but I should like to have that list included among the other things which the Senator is going to put in the RECORD, and with the backers, I believe you call them, or vouchers, of these different employees, and who they were charged to.

Mr. WETMORE. I suppose any Senator can get that information by a request from the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has just said that we could easily get it. I do not know whether I could or not.

Mr. WETMORE. Any Senator can get it easily.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly the Senator could, but I do not know that I could.

Mr. WETMORE. I am quite sure the Senator from Mississippi can get it as easily as the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know about that.

Mr. WETMORE. Suppose the Senator tries it, and if he is unable to get the information he might ask me, and we would try together.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the Senator be permitted to insert that matter with these other things and a list of the vouchers behind these gentlemen.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Wyoming will indulge the Chair he will put the request of the Senator from Rhode Island. It is that the report which he has read and other matter be printed in the RECORD. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CAPITOL POLICE STATIONS.

Station No. 1. West front: Regular detail. Important post. Visitors coming in on west front use this door, and officer is needed to direct strangers and sight-seers and to keep a lookout for beggars and suspicious characters getting into the building.

Station No. 2. Senate door: Regular relief. Principal entrance to Senate wing; open from 6 a. m. to midnight. Telephone station.

Station No. 3. Senate floor: Day service. Officer patrols corridors on the Senate floor. On duty from 9 a. m. to adjournment of Senate; also assists doorkeepers at south door of Senate and relieves them when they go to meals.

Station No. 4. Rotunda: Regular service. Principal entrance for excursionists. Important post during day on account of large number of strangers and sight-seers congregating there. When one of the Houses is in session officer guards the Rotunda door to the other wing. Raises and lowers the flags on east and west fronts.

Station No. 5. Statuary Hall: Regular relief. Important on account of the large number of strangers and sight-seers and in order to prevent vandalism. This post is abandoned when officer is required for special duty. Might be changed to day service only.

Station No. 6. House floor: Day service. Officer stands at main House card door. Space is very limited and it is necessary to keep crowds moving during session of the House. Assists doorkeepers in sending cards to Members of the House.

Station No. 7. House door: Regular relief. Main door of House wing. Open from 6 a. m. to midnight. Telephone station.

Station No. 8. Sergeant at Arms House of Representatives: Regular relief. Guards safe in disbursing office, which is on the ground floor in southeast corner of the building.

Station No. 9. Crypt: Regular relief. Doors open here to admit supplies being delivered prior to opening of building. This officer also prevents removal of Government property not authorized (see Police Manual, p. 21); also guards property condemned and awaiting sale.

Station No. 10. Terrace: Regular relief. Main west entrance to building. Three doors to guard—two Terrace doors and door to main building. Open day and night. Telephone station. Used by engineers, mechanics, and laborers going in and out at night and in the early morning.

Station No. 11. Senate Annex: Maltby Building. Regular relief. Only watchman in building. Telephone station.

Station No. 12. Senate reception room: Day service. Duty on Senate card door. Preserves order in the reception room, keeps crowds moving, and assists men at card door. On duty from 9 a. m. until Senate adjourns.

Station No. 13. Senate gallery: Day service. Two officers on this station regularly. On occasions when galleries are crowded and corridors filled with visitors waiting to be admitted, it has been necessary to detail two extra officers.

Station No. 14. Speaker's door: Day service. This officer guards the Speaker's door and keeps order in the corridor.

Station No. 15. Upper Dome: Day service. On duty from 9 a. m. to 4 p. m. This post is necessary for the preservation of order, to protect the Dome from defacement, and to guard sightseers from dangerous places.

Station No. 16. Lower Dome: Day service. On duty from 9 a. m. to 4 p. m. Conditions same as above.

Station No. 17. Special: (Webber) Day service. Detective. Plain-clothes man. Considered as necessary as any station in the Capitol. Circulates among the crowds to protect visitors from questionable characters. Also detailed to serve subpœnas of investigating committees.

Station No. 18. Special: (Quarles) Day service. Detective. Plain-clothes man. Conditions same as above.

Station No. 19. Turnkey: Officer locks and unlocks 13 doors of the Capitol every day except Sundays and holidays, opening 3 of them at 7 a. m. to admit supplies for the restaurants, also janitor and Government Printing Office employees, and closes them when the Senate and House adjourn, however late that may be. No other person in the past two years has had possession of the key that safeguards the Capitol. The plan of having one special officer to do this service has had the approval of the Superintendent of the Capitol and the Sergeants at Arms of the Senate and House.

Station No. 20. Telephone exchange: Night service. On detail at Capitol telephone exchange as night operator for the past 10 years. The telephone operators on day service are women.

Station No. 21. No regular station. Carried as a special on duty sheet to have a special man available for emergency duty.

Station No. 22. Northeast grounds: Regular relief. Patrol. Protects the lawns from trespassers and the roadways and plaza from invasion by unauthorized vehicles and from fast driving of all kinds.

Station No. 23. Northwest grounds: Regular relief. Same as above.

Station No. 25. Southwest grounds: Regular relief. Same as above.

Station No. 26. Special: (Bicycle) Day service. The bicycle officer patrols the grounds and driveways, warns automobile and carriage drivers against fast driving, keeps an eye on hackmen who follow their calling in the Capitol Grounds and can not be controlled by an officer on foot, catches and sends to the pound dogs without licenses.

Station No. 27. Cab stand, south: Day service. Directs the coming and going of all vehicles, their station while waiting, and calls Members' carriages. Important station.

Station No. 28. Cab stand, north: Day service. Main entrance to Senate wing. Duties of this officer same as above.

Station No. 29. Senate warehouse: Night duty. Is the only watchman in the building at First and B Streets SW., where Senate documents are stored.

Station A. Captain: Has general supervision of the Capitol police force under direction of the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives; is responsible for discipline, issues all orders, makes assignments and transfers, passes on applications for leave of absence, makes contracts for uniforms for the men, etc.

Station B. Lieutenants: Regular relief. One lieutenant for each relief. Day and night service. Is in command of the relief. Makes three inspections of all posts during his tour, including the Maltby Building, Senate Office Building, and Senate warehouse and the four posts on the Capitol Grounds.

Station C. Sergeants: Regular relief. One sergeant for each relief. Day and night service. Has charge of guardroom; keeps the record of his relief and makes daily report; acts as assistant to the lieutenant.

Station D. Clerk: Day service. Keeps the record of officers coming into the service and going out, keeps the time book, accounts of officers charged with equipments, pay accounts, and pay rolls, records of all lost and found articles, and records of all arrests and orders issued.

Station E. Detached service: At request of Sergeant at Arms of the House, detailed to assist the lieutenant in the House Office Building, where they are short-handed, and the force is composed almost entirely of new men.

Station F. Detached duty: On request of Sergeant at Arms of the House, detailed to do duty in plain clothes in House galleries.

Station G. Detached duty: (This station is now vacant.)

Station H. Assigned to Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and is acting as doorkeeper at the south door of the Senate.

Station I. Not assigned: The four officers not assigned, as well as the two officers on detached duty, are all required to take the places of men sick or on leave, and, in addition, to man certain stations that, while not continuous, still require men for considerable periods—such as the officer at the Supreme Court while the court is in session; the officers detailed at the hearings of committees; and extra officers on the main floor when the building is filled with sight-seers.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I was about to say that in accommodation of the Senator from Mississippi I might be able to read the list before we finish the consideration of this bill as to the backers of a great many of these people. The Senator will remember that I read a list yesterday and the backers of those who had accredited backers, but there were a good many of those who were old employees, who are hired by the Sergeant at Arms because of their ability for their work. I hardly expect that I could get the list on the House side without being called impertinent, as that is handled entirely from there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not requesting any list on the House side. I request a list on the Senate side, and I will let some wide-awake Republican get the list on the Democratic side. I suppose it can be done on both sides.

My understanding is that as a matter of fact here is this great big magnificent Capitol, in some respects the greatest building of its kind in the world, very valuable, and its safety is guarded, the safety of people going through it is guarded, not by a well-appointed police force, put there as policemen upon the police force of a city are placed, because of merit, but on the House side because every one of them is placed by the Democratic majority, and on the Senate side I understand that every one of them is placed by the Republican majority. It is just as purely a case of favoritism as ever existed. They are political hangers-on, and to them we intrust the safety of this great national property, and they attend to it with such little efficiency that although there are 67 of them hanging around between here and the House somewhere, somebody came in here the other day and ruthlessly cut one of the pictures in the Capitol all to pieces. When we are up here they are hanging around. I dare say that would not be the case if anyone would come up and go through here at night. It used to be my duty very frequently to do it, because then the minority room upon the House side was away up in the Capitol, and I had lots of work to be done and it had to be kept up with at night. So my force and I went there and were there at night again and again, and you could pass through this Capitol night after night and you would not hear anything except the resounding echoes of your own footsteps, and you would see a man at the door as you came in.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me? I expressed a regret yesterday because of the unbelief that seemed to exist, and I think as far as we got I was able to prove that there was no hidden graft in the bill, as had been intimated. I now propose to read the list of policemen, where they came from, the salary they are getting, and who is responsible for them, as nearly as I can.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator kindly tell us the document in which we will find that information? I want to find the document.

Mr. WARREN. I propose that the Senator shall read it to-morrow morning in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. I understand; but I thought the Senator had some document, and I wanted to get the name of the document, not that I do not trust the Senator's reading, but I want to know where to find it.

Mr. WARREN. There is no document about it. It is simply a list of the Sergeant at Arms, of which there is no duplicate.

Mr. REED. Very well; then I can get it in the RECORD.

Mr. WARREN. There is no duplicate, because it is liable to be changed every few days.

Before I commence I want to say that this list is very largely filled from the old soldiers' roll. That brings up the problem whether the Senators on this side of the House or on the other side of the House wish to attack the old soldiers' roll, that both sides have given their adherence to. If they do, now is a good time to do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How does that enter into this question?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will see as I read it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A great many were put on because they were old soldiers?

Mr. WARREN. They are on the roll now, and they are old soldiers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the average age of an old soldier now? Has the Senator any idea?

Mr. WARREN. Looking at the Senator from Mississippi and myself, the Senate can easily decide that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think not, because the Senate certainly would not decide it by looking at me. I was not 11 years old until after Johnston had surrendered. An old soldier who entered the Army very young anywhere near the beginning must be about 62, 63, or 64 now.

Mr. WARREN. Probably.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not intend to attack any old soldier, although the Senator seems to say so. I have not the slightest idea of doing it, either here or elsewhere. I never have done it in my life. But if I were going to select policemen for day and night service to defend a great building, they ought to be active young men, and especially if they are to keep guard to prevent fire and to prevent damage to paintings and things of that sort.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that many of them were young men when they came here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They may have been.

Mr. WARREN. They may be somewhat old now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But if they are now here they are not young men now, and can not possibly be very active unless they are an exception to the general rule.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say that I was very much astonished at the number of watchmen in the public buildings in Washington. These people are not only policemen but they are watchmen. I have gone into the question very thoroughly with the superintendents of these buildings, and when I saw 40 and 50 and 60 and 75 watchmen for a building I was simply astonished. I asked the superintendent, "How comes this?" He replied, "Take off 15 or 20 or 30 of these watchmen and what will be the result? The result will be that we will have the majority of them incompetent men. The young men will have to go. The competent men that we have employed are men who were not in the Army, and the law requires that in discharging these men we shall discharge the young men and leave the old men. Therefore if we cut down this force we have got to cut off the competent men and leave the incompetent men, because they are the old soldiers."

Mr. WILLIAMS. They ought to be pensioned, some of them, rather than be put in a place they can not fill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, if I recall correctly, at the beginning of this Congress the question of patronage was brought up before the Senate, and a committee was appointed and a great many of the employees of the Capitol were placed on the permanent roll and taken out of patronage. Some of them were policemen, and many of them were very old men, but by the unanimous vote, as I remember it, of the Senate, after some discussion, these gentlemen were placed on the permanent roll of the Senate, filling various offices. So if there is any complaint as to this class of men the complaint should be lodged against the Senate, because it was here discussed in open session, and many of these old soldiers were taken out from the list of patronage and their positions made permanent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator seems to misunderstand me. I am arraigning nobody. I am just in an inquiring mood. In fact, I did not make the inquiry of the Senator. Somebody proposed to give the information, and I thought it would be good to have it. I should like to have it, and I suggest now that we permit the Senator from Wyoming to give it to us.

Mr. WARREN. I am taking the time of the Senator from Rhode Island, with his indulgence, but I wish to stop a minute and say that after the House had undertaken to cut down their force last year you will all remember what occurred in the House Office Building. The pass keys were lost, and they had to change every lock on every door at the expense of several hundred dollars. That occurred amongst a great many other happenings. The places were filled, as has been stated, and that was considered necessary.

Now, as to this matter of the old soldiers' roll, I happened to serve in the war. I have never made a single special plea for the old soldier or for special pensions. I have not been one who has wanted to fill to overflowing the old soldiers' roll. In fact, I was one who objected in the Committee on Rules to an addition at present that would include all those who might have served in the Spanish War. I did not believe that the time had arrived for that. On the other hand, I hope my heart beats as warmly for the old soldier as that of any other man, on either side of the Chamber.

I remember the Senator from Mississippi—and I speak with entire respect—made a very pathetic appeal here for a man who was doing nothing, who had been recommended for dismissal because he was entirely useless, and the Senate backed the Senator from Mississippi and voted to retain the man, and he is drawing his salary yet. This committee has in this bill provided for a continuance of his salary, believing that it was right.

Now, we have men on the Capitol roll who have been here 25 or 30 years, men who were young once. I do not want to be personal, but if the Senator goes out through that west door and goes into the President's room, or if he goes through any one of several of these doors he will find men at the doors who have been there for 25 or 30 years, men who served in the Army, men who are old soldiers, some on one side and some on the other in the struggle of the Civil War.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am making no point about that.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator wants that brought up——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am making no point about that.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator was saying that their time for usefulness is past.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A man might be as old as Methuselah and make an excellent guard at one of these doors. There is no trouble about that. I thought the Senator was explaining about the Capitol police.

Mr. WARREN. That is the admission I want the Senator to make—the point that a man may be 80 years old and yet be a good man so far as his work here is concerned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator was referring to the Capitol police force. A policeman is not like a man who sits at a door.

Mr. WARREN. The policemen on night service have to guard the doors, and they have as much right to thus sit at the doors then as during the day. They are both policemen and watchmen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, if he has no duty but to sit at a door—but could he get up and make a rush to catch somebody who was perpetrating some evil? You can not get around the objection by making it apply to that particular place. By the way, I want to say, as far as the old-soldier feeling is concerned, I think one of the oldest men who sits at one of these doors was a rebel soldier.

Mr. WARREN. Of course; Col. Edwards.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And he was a mighty good one at that. I am very glad to see him sitting there, but if that man had to go over the Capitol Grounds and attend to the duties of a policeman I should say that it was not the place for him.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, as to the soldier he refers to, who is an admirable old fellow——

Mr. WILLIAMS. He is an excellent man.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very fond of him. Not many years ago we increased his salary three or four hundred dollars above that of the Union soldier who stands in that door. [Indicating.]

Mr. WARREN. Not only that, but——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely said that to show that I am not trying to bring that in here. I make no point upon the question as to whether they are or are not old soldiers. The Senator himself began to make that point in defense of the fact that there were so many of them on the roll. I merely made it by saying it could be no defense because they were men of that age. What I was trying to get at, regardless of the age and service of any of these men, is the manner in which they are appointed, and that the Senator holds in his hands.

Mr. WARREN. I propose, when I get this difference between the Senator and myself composed, to go on with it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All right.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator asked how old a man must be who served in the Army. Let me say to the Senator there are a good many men about the Hall here sixty years and odd, including the Senator himself, who are quite lively.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When I made the inquiry as to the old men who served here, it was after the Senator from Wyoming had said that he wanted to know who was going to make an attack, or something of that sort, upon the old soldiers. I merely made the remark that the fact that a man served in the war was not a reason of itself to believe that he would make a good Capitol policeman; but, on the contrary, if it argued anything, it argued that he was too old for that sort of work.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator calls them policemen. They are watchmen and policemen. We have not provided for watchmen for this building.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the Senator to talk about policemen.

Mr. OVERMAN. As I recollect it, in addition to being policemen these men are watchmen. They are called policemen, but a great many of them simply sit at the doors and watch, as I understand.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield further?

Mr. WETMORE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Before I leave the subject of the very admirable messenger at the door here, let me state that his salary was raised to $1,800, and because the minority asked for it. Let me say there were forty-odd—it is now thirty-odd—messengers, every one of whom wants the same salary now because this man has it; but that was tendered to him in respect of his old age; not because he was young, but because he was old, and because of his Army service, without regard to what Army he served in.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WARREN. I do not want to get too far away before I put in this list.

Mr. REED. The Senator can come right back to it. In order that this matter may not be misunderstood, let it be remembered that the discussion about the old soldiers and old men had its origin in the statement of some Senator from the other side that we were required under the law to discharge the younger men and that that would result in our discharging the efficient men. It may have been made from this side.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said that of one of the departments. That came out in another department.

Mr. REED. That came out and the discussion with reference to age sprang from that remark. I believe I was wrong. I believe it was made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. The point was not made from any antipathy to these old soldiers from this side. I just wanted that clear.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island further yield?

Mr. WETMORE. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from West Virginia brought the question up by making the statement that there were a good many policemen in the employment of the Government who were useless. I could not help but think of his position a year ago when this whole question was gone into by a committee and reported to the Senate. We found the case of a gentleman from West Virginia by the name of Mr. Lynch who had been in the employment of the Government a great many years. He was an old soldier, but he had not been on duty for a considerable time, and the committee recommended that his services be discontinued. Our recommendation in his case was the same as in all cases where men were on the pay roll and were unfit for work and did not report for work. I know that the Senator from West Virginia was very insistent that we should keep Mr. Lynch on the pay roll. The Senate voted that he should be employed, and he is now in the service of the Government. No doubt he would be classed as one of the employees that are useless, for he is one of the older men in service.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. WETMORE. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. I presume the Senator refers to a man who was the guard at the dome of the Capitol and met with an accident, and who was absent on account of that accident. I think you will find that the man has been on duty ever since I have been here. I have never missed him a day.

Mr. SMOOT. He has been on duty for some time past.

Mr. WATSON. I had nothing to do with his appointment.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I have knowledge of the fact. He is the old man, I suppose, now down on the floor below?

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. BACON. He was very severely injured in the discharge of his duty serving the Senate, and as soon as he was sufficiently restored he was returned to his work and has been at it ever since.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the testimony did not show that when the matter was before the Senate committee; but be that as it may, I want the Senator from West Virginia to understand, and also any Senator, that after the investigation all admitted that there were men employed who had passed, I will say, their usefulness. It was a question as to whether we should carry men on the pay roll of the Senate when they actually did no work, and the Senate decided it should be done. Therefore I acquiesced in it, although I was one of the committee that reported that such positions should be abandoned. I only say this for the information of the Senate.

Mr. WETMORE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill to permit me to say a word.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. WETMORE. I wish to say the problem that confronted the subcommittee was as to the number of men required to guard the Capitol. Their efficiency was not gone into. That is a question for the Senate to take up at any time. What we considered was the number of men required to properly guard and police the Capitol, and we think that the number can not be reduced. Now, whether any of them are worn out, and whether or not they are efficient is entirely a different question.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say in reading this roll that where I do not give the name of a backer there will be no name to give, because it will be some one who has remained here who was so useful to the Senate that he has been kept on the roll by the Sergeant at Arms in the same manner as the laborers and others on the roll which I read yesterday.

Mr. BACON. It is true, is it not, that a certain number of employees have been put on what is known as the permanent roll and are not changed?

Mr. WARREN. Not only that, but there is a soldiers' roll, which was adopted unanimously by the Senate. There is not only a soldiers' roll, but there is the permanent roll and a long-service roll. Take, for instance, the clerks here at the desk. They have been placed by both parties beyond the reach of other parties or Senators unless at some future time the Senate shall reverse itself.

Now, this roll commences here with J. P. Megrew, captain. He receives $1,600; is from Indiana. He is on the soldiers' roll.

John Hammond, lieutenant, $1,200, from New York; on the soldiers' roll.

F. N. Webber, sr., special, who serves as detective, and so forth, from Kentucky; charged to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY].

F. G. Jones, private, $1,050, from Indiana.

D. R. Nichols, private, $1,050, from Michigan; soldiers' roll.

J. A. Burrows, private, $1,050, Connecticut; soldiers' roll.

J. F. Sellers, $1,050, Pennsylvania; charged to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

T. C. Meeker, private—they are all privates now—$1,050, from Nevada; charged to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON].

James Holmes, $1,050, West Virginia.

George Butler, $1,050, Indiana; soldiers' roll.

A. L. Bentley, $1,050, New Mexico; to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON].

Clyde C. Way, $1,050, South Dakota; to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD].

E. R. Ernst, $1,050, Kansas; charged to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Loyd True, $1,050, Indiana.

Edward Becke, $1,050, Pennsylvania.

T. C. Ivins, $1,050, Pennsylvania; charged to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER].

E. B. Bell, $1,050, Michigan; charged to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

J. A. McMillan, $1,050, Wisconsin; charged to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON].

L. B. Moore, $1,050, Michigan; charged to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

G. A. Wilcox, $1,050, Rhode Island; charged to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE].

D. J. Berger, private, $1,050, New York; backed by the Vice President.

H. T. Davison, South Dakota; charged to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD].

T. F. Burke, $1,050, Massachusetts; backed by both the Senators from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE and Mr. LODGE].

H. A. Kasson, $1,050, Ohio, soldiers' roll.

J. G. Hamilton, $1,050, North Dakota; charged to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

E. T. McCarthy, $1,050, New Jersey; charged to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS].

J. R. Perry, $1,050, Pennsylvania; charged to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

H. J. Hauser, $1,050, Idaho; charged to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

W. B. Lurty, $1,050, Washington; charged to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

J. L. Ridenour, $1,050, Washington; charged to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

John Lane, $1,050, Michigan; charged to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

W. B. Greene, $1,050, Connecticut; charged to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN].

W. R. Johnson, $1,050, Illinois; charged to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER].

E. R. Ruggles, $1,050, Minnesota; charged to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

J. S. Abbott, $1,050, from Vermont.

J. L. Barnard, $1,050, from Idaho; charged to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. As I understand it, that list is for the Capitol police. Could the Senator read the list from the Senate Office Building, composed of 16 privates, and let us see to whom they are charged?

Mr. WARREN. I have no list of the 16 privates for the Senate Office Building.

Mr. CULBERSON. We provide for them in this bill.

Mr. WARREN. Where?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have passed over it. It is on page 10.

Mr. CULBERSON. On page 10?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We changed it from 7 to 16 privates.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that there are 63 privates in the Capitol police. In the Senate Office Building there are 16 provided for in this bill, and in the House Building there are 10 provided for at page 19. What I wanted of the Senator from Wyoming, if it was convenient for him——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator will understand——

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator did not probably understand me. I understood him to read a list of the private policemen in the Capitol Building and to whom they were charged.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. What I want to know is if we have a corresponding list of private policemen for the Senate Office Building and to whom they are charged?

Mr. WARREN. I have not asked for that, but I shall investigate it. Of course, it came up by this being a joint matter between the House and the Senate. These policemen are joint officers, as the Senator knows.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes. There are 33 for the Senate and about the same number for the House.

Mr. WARREN. Say, 67 altogether, and they are arranged between the two Houses.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes; I understand that.

There is one other matter to which I want to invite the attention of the chairman of the committee, and that is that there are provided for the House Building 10 private policemen, whereas the Senate Building, as the bill is proposed to be amended by the Senate committee—to which I called attention, by the way, in committee—provides for 16 policemen. I do not understand why there should be a greater number of policemen in the Senate Building to provide for 95 Senators than for the House Building, when that body has 394 Members.

Mr. WARREN. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from Texas forgets that all these grounds have to be policed around the Senate building, and that there are no grounds to police at the other building. There are 12 policemen detailed to the grounds here.

Mr. CULBERSON. Probably the Senator did not catch my meaning. There are only 10 policemen provided for to police the House Office Building, whereas it is proposed to amend the pending bill so as to provide for 16 policemen in the Senate Office Building. I do not understand why there should be 6 more policemen to keep order with us than is required to keep order with the 394 Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WARREN. I suppose they are more orderly over there than we are here. [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, perhaps I ought to say a word. I was on the subcommittee, and I want to say right here that I did object to the number of policemen provided for the Senate Office Building. I think there are too many there now. I think also that the Capitol police might be cut down by six. They are allowed 50 days' leave, which I think is too much. If we cut down the leave of absence to 30 days, that will allow us to cut down 6 policemen.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator should remember that there are no holidays for the police force—no Sundays.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that. Cutting down the leave of absence is the only way I see that we can reduce the number of the Capitol police.

I examined this matter. I thought it looked outrageous to have so many policemen around this Capitol Building; but they are something more than policemen. We did not provide for any watchmen, and therefore these men are not only policemen to keep order, but they are also watchmen in Statuary Hall and in other places here. If any Senator will examine the plans and specifications, which we have made out, and will look at the entrances to this building and the important positions in the building, it will be seen that it is absolutely necessary for some one, either a watchman or policeman, to be stationed there. I do not believe there is a Senator here who will disagree with me in that report.

As has been said, there are 59 acres of ground surrounding these buildings, which have to be policed. These watchmen or policemen work but eight hours a day. Therefore, there being 67 policemen, one-third of 67 would be, say, 22. Senators should consider the number of competent policemen that go out in the grounds, some on their bicycles, who ride around to stop fast driving, to stop depredations upon the shrubbery, and to watch over these 59 acres of ground. This requires 4 or 5 plain-clothes men and 1 or 2 detectives. Then there are about 17 or 18 men who are required here at the entrances. There are many entrances to these buildings. Men are required to stand at this door here for this great corridor [indicating]; one is required to stand there [indicating]; one to stand in Statuary Hall to preserve the beautiful statuary in the old Hall of the House of Representatives, and another in the Rotunda, where the paintings are. If you will take the estimate we have made and examine the specifications, you will see that there is no place from which we could discharge one of these policemen.

Furthermore, I went into an examination of this matter thoroughly by taking the testimony of witnesses; and it appeared that if we are to accept the judgment of the Sergeant at Arms, of the Superintendent of the Capitol, Mr. Woods, and also that of the captain of the Capitol police, who say they can not discharge one of these men without being crippled in the protection of the building, we can not well make a reduction. We have to be governed somewhat by their testimony.

Mr. WETMORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. WETMORE. If the Senator from North Carolina will take the time to call off any particular place I will tell him exactly who is stationed there and whether on "regular relief," "day service," or otherwise.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, take the man at the cab stand.

Mr. WETMORE. What plan is the Senator referring to—the basement or the first floor?

Mr. OVERMAN. This is the House front, first, I see.

Mr. WARREN. What floor?

Mr. OVERMAN. "Basement plan, United States Capitol."

Mr. WETMORE. What is the number?

Mr. OVERMAN. No. 27. I think Senators ought to know exactly where every man is stationed, so as to see whether we can discharge anyone. We have concluded we would leave it to the Senate to see if any Senator could suggest one man who could be discharged.

Mr. WETMORE. I do not think the Senator will find No. 27 on the basement floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is marked here "cab stand."

Mr. WETMORE. That is outside on the plaza, and is No. 27, day service, cab stand.

Mr. OVERMAN. We are now reading No. 26. I will ask the Senator from Rhode Island to read No. 26. That is the east front.

Mr. WETMORE. Twenty-six is:

(Bicycle) Day service. The bicycle officer patrols the grounds and driveways, warns automobile and carriage drivers against fast driving, keeps an eye on hackmen who follow their calling in the Capitol Grounds who need watching and can not be controlled by an officer on foot, catches and sends to the pound dogs without licenses.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, take No. 24——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us ask the Senator questions as we go along. Why is it that the Senate ought to provide a man to catch dogs and send them to the pound? It seems to me the District of Columbia should do that.

Mr. WETMORE. They have no right to be here on the Capitol Grounds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will Senators please bear in mind that the official reporters desire to make a record of what is being said?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think I will just submit this document to the Senator from Mississippi and let him ask questions of the Senator from Rhode Island. Then, if the Senator from Mississippi can find where any man can be discharged, I shall be very glad to learn of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, as to No. 26?

Mr. WETMORE. Where is that—on the basement floor?

Mr. WILLIAMS. On the basement floor.

Mr. WETMORE. I have just read as to No. 26. There are 59 acres in the Capitol Grounds. There is a policeman stationed at each of the sections—northeast, southeast, southwest, and northwest—to take care of each quarter of the Capitol Grounds. Those policemen have to be on duty day and night, not only to guard during the day, but during the night to prevent highway robbery, and also unbecoming conduct that sometimes occurs in dark places or in lighter places.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, as to No. 22, right on the other side?

Mr. WETMORE. As to No. 22:

Northeast grounds: Regular relief; patrol; protects the lawns from trespasses and the roadways and plaza from invasion by unauthorized vehicles and fast driving of all kinds.

Nos. 23, 24, and 25 perform the same duties.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I find another one, marked "28, cab stand, north."

Mr. WETMORE. As to 28:

Cab stand, north: Day service. Main entrance to the Senate Wing; duties of this officer same as No. 27.

That officer—

Directs the coming and going of all vehicles, their station while waiting, and calls Members' carriages.

Also when automobiles happen to approach in the wrong direction he prevents collisions, although I understand a collision took place the other day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, as to 27 and 28, which have as a part of their duties calling cabs for Members and Senators?

Mr. WETMORE. Yes. They have the same duties, except there is one officer for the House and another for the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said for Members of the House and of the Senate. Now, we will go to the next story. This one is marked "Principal floor plan."

Mr. WETMORE. What number does the Senator want?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is No. 3.

Mr. WETMORE. That is the Rotunda, one of the main approaches to the Capitol. More excursionists go through there than perhaps through any other portion of the building.

Mr. REED. I should like to inquire if this is in the nature of a confidential communication?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is inclined to think that it is; but the Chair thinks that it ought not to be. Will Senators supposedly occupying the floor give the Chair attention for a moment? The Senator from Missouri rises to a question of order, that seemingly what is going on is a private conversation between two Senators.

Mr. WETMORE. I had supposed my voice had carried farther than that.

Mr. WILLIAMS (to Mr. WETMORE). Come back here and we will speak louder.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I would suggest that a committee of three be appointed to look after the details of that chart, and that the Senate proceed to the transaction of business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We are transacting business now. The Senator from Rhode Island is trying to explain where each one of these men is stationed.

Mr. BRISTOW. My suggestion was that a committee of three be appointed to attend to that chart and that the Senate proceed with the transaction of business.

Mr. WETMORE. What would be the result of that suggestion?

Mr. BRISTOW. Let the committee report to the Senate its findings at a later date.

Mr. WETMORE. Before this bill is through?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And yet, if it is going to shed any light upon this particular business, we had better find out now where these men are located.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say to the Senator from Kansas, in view of what the Senator from Mississippi has said, that he is hardly showing proper respect to our rapid progress. We have nearly accomplished the feat of considering a quarter of one page of the bill up to this time—in about five hours; so I think the Senator from Kansas is getting unduly impatient.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there was a proposition made to show to Senators just where each one of these policemen was placed, with the idea of demonstrating to the Senate that the Senate could not afford to do without the services of any one of them. The Senator from Rhode Island is attempting to do that, and he needs somebody to help him to call the numbers while he finds the service these men are performing. If the Senate does not want to know where these men are, I do not see how the Senate is going to find out whether or not it can get along without them.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I am thoroughly in sympathy with the operations of the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Rhode Island, but unfortunately we can not all see the map, and, therefore, I ask unanimous consent, in connection with this debate, that the chart be printed in the RECORD along with the debate.

Mr. WETMORE. That would probably take two weeks.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But the discussion is of little use to other Senators who can not see the map.

Mr. WETMORE. I quite agree with the Senator; but how are you going to get over it?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I propose to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WETMORE. I say it will take two weeks to do that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We will be far longer than two weeks on this bill according to present progress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I request that the diagrams be published in the RECORD, too, so that the matter may be understood.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Let the whole thing be published in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That seems to me a very satisfactory solution of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 13, line 8, before the word "lieutenants," to strike out "two" and insert "three."

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is what we have been discussing here all day, and I do not want the amendment passed by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to discuss it or shall the Chair put the question?

Mr. REED. I want to say a word about the merits of this proposition.

We have had a report read here from the Sergeant at Arms, who apparently occupies in this matter the position of chief of police. The Sergeant at Arms says he can not do with a less number of policemen. I never saw a chief of police yet who had enough policemen to suit him. It was not only my misfortune, but the misfortune of my city once that I was mayor of that city and a member of the police board. We had a very good chief of police, but there never was a day or an hour that the chief of police would not have liked to have doubled his force, and yet we got along in a city of about 250,000 inhabitants with about one policeman for every thousand people, and that city happened to be one of the gateways to the great West, and through it there were constantly flowing large numbers of that element of society, the migratory human birds, that commit a great portion of the crimes; yet that police force of approximately one for every thousand people was obliged to police the depots, the gateways of the town, the dram-shop districts, the dangerous district of the city, and the members of it served 12 hours a day. Half of the time the men served at night and half of the time during the day.

Mr. President, if 250 policemen could look after that large population, with hundreds and hundreds of miles of streets, six or seven hundred dram shops, run to earth the criminal element that was in that city, as it is in all other cities, attend the police courts and produce testimony in the criminal courts, guard the street crossings—and many of them were assigned to the duty of acting as guards at street crossings—and perform the multitudinous duties falling upon the ordinary policeman in a large city, then I say that it is upon its face—I will not say "absurd"—but upon its face it is an extreme proposition to claim that we need 67 policemen here on the Capitol Grounds, attached to this one building; in addition to that, 16 policemen in the Senate Office Building and 10 more policemen over at the House Office Building. That makes a total of 93 policemen; and when we go across the Capitol Grounds to the Congressional Library, I take it we will find a large detail of policemen there. In addition to all that, the Capitol Grounds and the Capitol Building are under the protection now of the regular police force of the city the same as other portions of the city are under the protection of the regular police force.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is mistaken in the supposition that the Metropolitan police have any jurisdiction over the grounds of the Capitol. I am very clear in the view that they are excluded from these grounds.

Mr. REED. I should have made my statement a little more specific and meant to have done so. The Capitol Grounds are under their protection in this way: That if there was a riot or any disorder they could be called upon, and these grounds are also under the protection of the Metropolitan police in this, that the criminal element coming into this town or infesting this community are handled by the Metropolitan police.

Mr. GALLINGER. In that respect the Senator is right. I apprehend if a crime were committed on the Capitol Grounds and the criminal escaped beyond the grounds the Metropolitan police would have jurisdiction.

Mr. REED. Yes; and I think they would take jurisdiction very speedily.

I am informed that in the city of Memphis, a large and populous city, they have only about 75 policemen. There is a city of approximately 160,000 people, with great commercial interests, and a population coming up and down the river. Those elements that will be found in all large cities that do not make for law and order are, of course, in Memphis—not more than in other cities, but there are plenty of them there, as there are in all large cities. If it is necessary to have 67 policemen in the Capitol Building, 16 policemen in the Senate Office Building, 10 policemen in the House Office Building, and other policemen in the Congressional Library, then this must be the most lawless spot on the face of the earth. At the same rate, the city at large would need a police force of about 2,500, and I do not know how many thousands they would need in New York City, but it certainly would be a good-sized standing army.

In the early part of this discussion it was suggested that the reason we needed so many men was because a large number of the present policemen were superannuated. I observe these policemen, as others do, and I do not think it can be said that there are many of them so old that they can not fulfill their duties. I do not think that argument is a sound one.

Then it was suggested that a large number of them was necessary to be kept because they were on the old soldiers' roll; yet, as I heard the list read by the chairman of the committee, I did not find that the old soldier element preponderated, but rather that the element recommended by Senators was very largely in the majority.

It is easy enough to say that we need a man at this spot and one at another particular place; but, Mr. President, policemen in cities have to guard beats sometimes miles in length; they have to guard with reference to fire as well as with reference to life; and there is no reason that I can see why we need a policeman at every corner in this Capitol. There is no reason that I can see why a policeman must be given a standing position at some point in this building; there is no reason that I know of why two policemen should be posted in front of this building to call cabs; in other words, if we were entirely frank about this matter, I think we would be compelled to say that about one-half of this force is a luxury. It is nice to have them around, but they cost money, and therefore I object to having them around unless they are necessary.

At the other end of the Capitol the policemen are required to perform the same duties they are required to perform here, and there are nearly four times the number of Representatives that there are Senators. As you multiply the number of Representatives, you multiply the number of people going to and from that end of the Capitol. It is a fact that everybody must know that the galleries of the House of Representatives are crowded more than are the galleries of the Senate; more people come and go; and yet the House committee and the House itself has seen fit to cut the number in that end of the Capitol to 37.

Mr. WETMORE. Mr. President, they are still employed, even if they have cut them off.

Mr. REED. They will be employed until this bill becomes a law; and when this bill becomes a law they will no longer be employed. The Senator and I can not disagree that the policy of the House is to cut the number to 37.

Mr. WETMORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WETMORE. I may state that one of the Capitol police is detailed to the House Office Building on account of the inadequacy of the force there.

Mr. REED. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. WETMORE. By request from the House side, I think, there are four other policemen also detailed to certain duties in the House Office Building.

Mr. REED. The Senator misunderstood me. I am speaking about the 37 policemen in the Capitol.

Mr. WETMORE. I suppose that man is one of the 37.

Mr. REED. I am not speaking about the Senate Office Building.

Mr. WETMORE. I was not, either.

Mr. REED. I do not consider that there is any force in the suggestion of the Senator that some experienced policeman was called on to go over and train the inexperienced men who came in when the majority shifted in the House of Representatives. They did put in inexperienced men, which illustrates the truth of what the Senator from Mississippi said when he intimated that, after all, the distribution of policemen was a matter of the distribution of spoils and that men were not employed because of their ability or because of their skill, but because of their politics.

It is not at all remarkable that they had to send for some one to train these green men. I apprehend that some of the men who came in did not know how to find their way through the corridors and the meanderings at the other end of the Capitol. But they nevertheless are getting along with their 37 men, and they are not now clamoring for assistance; and they are getting along with their 10 men in the House Office Building, where we insist upon having 16, while our building is the smaller, or at least the less populous. So that, Mr. President, I am opposed to this amendment, and I ask for a roll call upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED. Upon which I have asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. REED. I move to strike out in line 8, on page 13, the word "three" and insert the word "two."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the amendment upon which the vote is about to be taken.

Mr. REED. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the pending amendment.

Mr. REED. Exactly, and I move to strike out the word "three" and insert "two."

The VICE PRESIDENT. But the pending amendment is to insert "three" instead of "two."

Mr. REED. I understand it now. It comes in the other form. I want to ask a question. The matter has not been discussed. Why do we need three lieutenants—three commanding officers?

Mr. WETMORE. There are three shifts of policemen, and there is one officer in charge of each shift.

Mr. REED. They have eight-hour shifts?

Mr. WETMORE. Eight-hour shifts.

Mr. REED. How many hours do the Capitol policemen work—8 hours or 12?

Mr. WETMORE. Eight hours.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I raise the question of quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Clapp	Jones	Smith, Ga.
Bacon	Clark, Wyo.	Lea	Smith, Md.
Bailey	Cullom	McCumber	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Cummins	Martin, Va.	Smoot
Bourne	Curtis	Myers	Stephenson
Bradley	Fletcher	Oliver	Stone
Briggs	Gallinger	Overman	Thornton
Bristow	Gardner	Page	Townsend
Brown	Gore	Perkins	Warren
Bryan	Gronna	Reed	Watson
Burnham	Heyburn	Richardson	Wetmore
Catron	Hitchcock	Simmons	Williams
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. JONES. My colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber by important business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been refused on this amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What are we voting on now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is about to vote upon the amendment in line 8, page 13, to strike out "two" and insert "three."

Mr. REED. That is the only part of this proposition upon which we are now voting?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is all.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, a number of Senators came in and answered to the call of the roll. The motion was made, as I understand—and the Chair will correct me if I am wrong—by the Senator from Missouri to disagree to the committee amendment to insert three lieutenants instead of two.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the committee amendment to strike out "two" and insert "three."

Mr. WARREN. The reason I asked the question is that Senators may know the exact question.

We are in this condition. There are three shifts of police during the day. There are the House and the Senate and the grounds to be overlooked. If a lieutenant is needed at all, three are needed, so that there may be one on duty all the time. I hope the committee may be sustained by an affirmative vote on the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 13, line 9, after the word "and," to strike out "thirty-three" and insert "sixty-seven," so as to read "67 privates, at $1,050 each."

Mr. REED. That is the main question which we have been discussing here for several hours—whether we will have 33 policemen or 67. The House, as I understand, has already fixed the number at 33. Upon the question of agreeing to that amendment, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WARREN. A question of order. I ask the Vice President to state the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee's amendment, in line 13, page 9, proposing to strike out "thirty-three" and insert "sixty-seven." The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BAILEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON], and withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when Mr. CHILTON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CHILTON] is necessarily absent from the city. He is, however, paired with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BAILEY (when Mr. DIXON's name was called). The Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] is in Chicago.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I transfer it to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and will vote. I vote "yea."

While I am on my feet, I wish to announce the pair of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. GARDNER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE].

Mr. HEYBURN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I transfer it to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am paired with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. OLIVER (when the name of Mr. PENROSE was called). My colleague [Mr. PENROSE] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] to the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to inquire whether the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—33.

Bacon	Cullom	Martin, Va.	Stephenson
Bradley	Curtis	Nelson	Thornton
Briggs	Dillingham	Oliver	Tillman
Bristow	Foster	Overman	Townsend
Brown	Gallinger	Page	Warren
Burnham	Gronna	Perkins	Wetmore
Catron	Heyburn	Richardson
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Smith, Md.
Clark, Wyo.	McCumber	Smoot

NAYS—13.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Reed	Watson
Bryan	Jones	Smith, Ga.
Fletcher	Lea	Smith, S. C.
Gore	Myers	Stone

NOT VOTING—49.

Bailey	Davis	Lorimer	Root
Bankhead	Dixon	McLean	Sanders
Borah	du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Bourne	Fall	Newlands	Simmons
Brandegee	Gamble	Nixon	Smith, Ariz.
Burton	Gardner	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.
Chilton	Guggenheim	Owen	Sutherland
Clapp	Johnson, Me.	Paynter	Swanson
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Penrose	Williams
Crane	Kern	Percy	Works
Crawford	La Follette	Poindexter
Culberson	Lippitt	Pomerene
Cummins	Lodge	Rayner

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the question of agreeing to the committee amendment the yeas are 33 and the nays 13. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] having announced their pairs and that they refrained from voting, because of being paired, it makes a quorum; the yeas have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before the result was announced I sought the recognition of the Chair. I wish to say that as I understand there is no rule of the Senate which authorizes those who do not vote upon a yea-and-nay call to be counted.

Mr. President, this is a self-governing body; this is a body in which the Senators make their own rules and enforce them; and that is not the rule of the Senate; it has never been the rule of the Senate, and I hope never will be the rule of the Senate. Of course, I recognize the fact, Mr. President, that frequently precedents are made in parliamentary bodies under stress of political or other influences which induce members of the parliamentary body to cast their votes, frequently because the casting of their votes in a particular way will accomplish the particular thing then under consideration.

It so happens that upon this occasion I am one of those who voted with the majority, and therefore in making this objection to the ruling of the Chair I am not influenced by the fact that that ruling accomplished a result which I myself favored. On the contrary, I favored the result which would be sustained by that ruling of the Chair.

Mr. President, of course there are some Senators here who have been here much longer than I have, but I have been here now for more than 17 years; and I wish to say, in all respect for the present occupant of the chair, for whom I personally have the highest regard and respect, that, so far as I know and can recall, prior to the occupancy of the chair by the present distinguished, honored, and highly esteemed officer, there has never been such a ruling in the Senate.

Of course, I know the facts that there have been occasions when there have been efforts made to justify the proposition that the Chair had the right to count a quorum, and that is a precedent which may in particular instances have been in a way recognized; but it is a rule which has never, so far as I know, received the distinct recognition and approval of the Senate.

Mr. President, this is no ordinary parliamentary body. This is a body with distinct and peculiar functions. This is a body with distinct and peculiar responsibilities and powers, far greater than those belonging to other parliamentary bodies, and I for one am unwilling that the rules which have been observed for a hundred years shall be overturned in this way.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that upon another occasion recently a vote was taken on a bill that is upon the calendar, in which I am interested and the vote was affirmatively in favor of the motion which I made, but a quorum did not vote and the motion was declared lost because a quorum had not voted. That was repeated upon more than one occasion that day, and it is an exact parallel to this case.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. President, I want to say this: I have seen occasions when upon a division the count showed the number voting less than a quorum, and I have seen that passed over several times without remarks.

I want to say that I myself have at times objected, at other times I have sat silent when that has been done, because it is not pleasant to take issue with the Chair. It is not pleasant to be making a point of this kind. The acceptance of the count in such cases can only be justified upon the ground that when a motion is put viva voce, very frequently there is nobody who votes at all, and in the absence of a vote the Chair says the ayes have it, upon the assumption that the absence of any negative vote indicates an assent on the part of Senators, and that the reasoning might be carried a little further and applied to the absence of a certain number voting upon a division. In other words, applied to the case where, on a division, less than a quorum vote. While I do not approve of that suggestion, still it is suggested that it may be conceded or concluded from that that those who do not vote are assenting. But I do not agree to that at all. Still that is the argument as to that. But that argument can not be applied to a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did I understand the Senator correctly to say that the decision just announced was without precedent in the Senate; that a quorum had never been counted before?

Mr. BACON. No; I did not say that. I referred to the ruling made by the Chair to-day, in which, after the call of the yeas and nays was concluded, showing less than a quorum, the Chair read the names of those who had announced a pair and said, counting the pairs thus announced on that vote, there was a quorum.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would the Senator permit me to read what Mr. Thurman said on that point?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER (reading):

On question of laying an appeal from the decision of the Chair on the table yeas were 32, nays 3—no quorum voting. The President pro tempore (Mr. Thurman) counted the Senate and announced a quorum present in the following language:

"The Chair has usually taken the fact of there being no quorum voting as evidence that there was no quorum present, but the Chair has not decided that it is not possible to ascertain otherwise whether there is a quorum. The Chair does not think the fact that a quorum has not voted is conclusive evidence that a quorum is not present. On the contrary, in the opinion of the Chair, he has a right to count the Senate. He has counted the Senate and found that a quorum is in attendance, but a quorum has not voted.

If the Senator will permit me, Vice President Breckinridge made the same decision and Vice President Fairbanks decided in the same way.

Mr. BACON. Let me have the other decisions.

Mr. GALLINGER (reading):

During the consideration of S. 161, "For the admission of Kansas into the Union," on a motion to adjourn no quorum voted.

The Vice President (Mr. Breckinridge) "stated to the Senate that the number of Senators voting did not constitute a quorum of the Senate, but that, in the opinion of the Chair, a quorum was present in the Chamber."

Mr. BACON. There was no quorum required on that vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true. In the case of Mr. Fairbanks:

Mr. Aldrich raised a question of order, viz, that a Senator must be in possession of the floor, and that he can not take the floor by asking a parliamentary inquiry, and then make any motion.

The Vice President (Mr. Fairbanks) sustained the question of order.

An appeal having been taken from the decision of the Chair,

On motion by Mr. Aldrich to lay the appeal on the table, yeas 32, nays 14—no quorum voting.

The Vice President (Mr. Fairbanks) counted the Senate and announced that a quorum was present, and so the motion prevailed.

Mr. BACON. Was that on a yea-and-nay vote?

Mr. GALLINGER. On a yea-and-nay vote, 32 to 14.

Mr. BACON. I stand corrected to that extent. That instance had escaped my recollection.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will find it at page 403 of Gilfry's Precedents.

Mr. BACON. Has the Senator the proceedings before him?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not.

Mr. BACON. Very well. The Senator will find that in that particular case I am sure, because that is since I have been here, it was protested against at that time. I have never assented to such a ruling.

Mr. GALLINGER. It may have been protested against, but it was a motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. BACON. I do say one of the most vital questions that can come before the Senate is whether or not the Presiding Officer can declare a law enacted when less than a majority of the Senate votes on the question of the passage of that law, and the results to which it can lead are some which we can now appreciate the gravity of; but there are others that will doubtless present themselves in the future that we do not now realize.

Mr. President, I say this is not a matter for construction by a Presiding Officer of this body. It is a matter to be determined only by the specific rules of the Senate. This is not an ordinary parliamentary body. This is not a body in which the Presiding Officer is taken from the House itself. This is a self-governing body, and we are highly honored by the fact that the Vice President is called on to preside over it. I would not have it otherwise. I think it dignifies this body that the Vice President of the United States is chosen to preside over it and is assigned to that duty by the fundamental law of the land. I would not under any circumstances have it otherwise. I am gratified not only that such is the law, but by the fact that since I have had the honor to have a seat in this Chamber those who have been chosen for that high office and who have presided over the Senate have not only by their official station, but in their several persons, given dignity and character and consequence to the deliberations of this Chamber.

But while that is true, Mr. President, it can not be ignored that the fact that the Presiding Officer is not a Member of this body carries with it an increased responsibility and power in the body itself to make its own rules and to govern itself. When a Presiding Officer is chosen by the body, he represents the majority of that body and is responsible to that majority. That is not true of the Vice President presiding over the Senate.

Mr. President, there is no rule in our list of rules which gives to the Presiding Officer of this body that power, and that power should not be exercised unless it is distinctively conferred by this body. We have rules which are prescribed. They are made by this body and we have the power to change them. We have the power to repeal those which are there, and we have the power to make others; and until this body determines, not simply upon an occasion when party exigency may call upon Senators to speak in a way when they possibly would speak otherwise under other circumstances, but until the Senate determines and orders in its regular way, through a rule brought in a regular way before this body, that the Presiding Officer has the right to count a quorum, then, Mr. President, I protest against it with all the vigor and all the earnestness of which my nature is capable.

Mr. President, what is the fundamental rule as to the passage of a law? It is one thing to say that a quorum is present to do business. It is another thing to say whether or not a quorum has done the business. If we were to go to the extent of saying that the Presiding Officer can count a quorum and say that therefore the business shall proceed, that is one proposition. That is going further than I am willing to have it go, because I think the only way to disclose a quorum is by the answer of Senators on the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Would the Senator permit me?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will let me conclude that sentence, I want to draw the contrast. One is the exercise of the power to count a quorum for the purpose of ascertaining whether a sufficient number of Senators are present in order to constitute the body as a legal body to do business. That is one thing; but the fundamental proposition is that to pass a law a majority of a quorum must either actually or by recognized assent approve of that law. To pass a law it is not sufficient that there should be a quorum present. To pass a law it is necessary that a majority of a quorum should favor the passage of that law. That is exactly what this proceeding will negative and destroy, and put it in the power of the minority not only for a minority to pass a bill, but for less than a majority to vote upon the question to pass the law. Can it be said for a moment that when the law requires that a majority is necessary to pass a law it shall be less than a majority voting upon that question?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator certainly does not wish to say that it takes a majority of the Senate to pass a law.

Mr. BACON. I have said repeatedly a majority of a quorum.

Mr. WARREN. A majority of those present.

Mr. BACON. A majority of a quorum.

Mr. WARREN. And they must be present, of course.

Mr. BACON. Certainly. It can not be a quorum unless it is present.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not doubt that the number were present in the Senate when the Presiding Officer announced it. He does not doubt that Senators were here as they voted and as announced?

Mr. BACON. But I am trying to draw a distinction between a quorum being present and therefore being a body sufficient in numbers present to proceed with business, and less than a quorum voting on the question. That is what I say. I say, Mr. President, that there can be no passage of a law unless a majority of a quorum vote for that law; and that quorum must be present; and that, in the absence of a specific rule made to the contrary by the body itself, the only way to ascertain that a quorum is present is the answer to the roll call.

When there is no call for the yeas and nays and the vote is taken viva voce, then, of course, the presumption is that those who are not voting are assenting; but that can not be the case when the yeas and nays are called. When the yeas and nays are called the question is distinctly raised how each man votes and the question is distinctively and affirmatively decided not only how every man votes but how many men there are voting, and nothing is taken by construction or by assent.

Therefore, Mr. President, I say that to count Senators not voting is a violation of the fundamental proposition that in order that a law shall be passed a quorum shall vote on it, and that a majority of that quorum shall favor that law. I ask pardon of the Senator from Texas for having delayed him as long as I have done, and I now yield to him.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, what I wanted to ask the Senator just at that point was whether a quorum as here disclosed is disclosed by the answers of Senators appearing on the record or whether the quorum has been disclosed by a count of the Chair. My understanding was that the Chair ascertains the quorum from the record, adding to those who have voted on the roll call the names only of the Senators who answered to their names but who instead of voting announced their pairs.

I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Georgia that the occupant of the chair, either temporary or permanent, has no right to look about the Senate and count Senators. I would utterly dissent from the statement of Mr. Thurman in the Precedents of the Senate, read by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], but where the record itself discloses a quorum and where, as the Senator so aptly said, the presence of a quorum is ascertained by the responses of the Senators, there I am inclined to think the rule might be safely followed.

I merely wanted to invite the attention of the Senator from Georgia to what appears to me a difference between a quorum ascertained by a roll call and a quorum ascertained by the mere counting of the Chair. It might or it might not happen that the Chair would count some Senator who had voted or would count some Senator who did not want to be counted; but when the Senator himself records his presence in the Chamber, I ask the Senator from Georgia whether that differs the case at all?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am afraid my distinguished and learned friend was not listening to what I said in the second part of the proposition which I presented, or else I was not myself happy in my statement.

Mr. BAILEY. I will state to the Senator from Georgia he is always clear and I always understand him, but I was called out of the Chamber a moment ago and I might not have heard what he said on that point.

Mr. BACON. The Senator was sitting exactly in the seat where he is now when I made that proposition.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I just this moment took this seat.

Mr. BACON. It may be it was the second chair from that he now occupies. The proposition is this, Mr. President: If it were a question whether or not the proceedings should be suspended on account of the absence of a quorum——

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him before he addresses himself to that point, I did not miss that and I did not ignore the force of that argument, but I rose to ask him the other question.

Mr. BACON. I am trying now to answer it.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not sure that I disagree with the Senator about that, but that was not my question.

Mr. BACON. What I was about to say is this, Mr. President: If when the roll is called and 43 Senators vote "yea" or "nay" and 8 Senators get up and announce their pairs, that does disclose the fact that a quorum is present, and the Chair would not be under obligation to say that there is no quorum present and therefore the Sergeant at Arms must go and bring in absent Senators; because by that fact of the announced presence of Senators it is disclosed that there is a quorum present. But the point I make is that when you come to the question of the passage of a law you can not say, because eight other Senators are in the Chamber and did not vote on the call of the yeas and nays, therefore less than a quorum acting upon a question can pass a law. The eight did not vote and can not be counted as voting.

Mr. BAILEY. Less than a majority?

Mr. BACON. Less than a quorum. I will repeat exactly the words I used. I said "Less than a quorum acting upon that proposition"; and in order to pass it, of course, there would have to be a majority of that quorum. When I say less than a quorum acting upon that proposition, I mean less than a quorum voting both "yea" and "nay"; that is, those voting both "yea" and "nay" making less than a quorum.

Does the Senator now understand what I mean by that? My proposition is that when less than a quorum vote, counting both the yeas and nays, that is not a vote, although a majority of that number voting may vote in a particular way. It is not a vote which can legally pass a law, because to pass a law it must be acted upon by a quorum. It is not sufficient that a quorum should be present; it is necessary that a majority of a quorum should vote in order to pass a law. It is not that the vote discloses that there is no quorum present, but it is the fact that less than a quorum voted upon the question of the passage of that law. That is the proposition. The Chair is not in such case called upon to say there is no quorum present and then wait for some Senator to suggest that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to request the presence of Senators. He would not be called upon to do that, because the responses have shown that there is a quorum here, but I announce it as a fundamental proposition, and I challenge any Senator who disputes it to produce the authority in a standard work on parliamentary law to the contrary, that to pass a law, in the absence of a rule of the body to the contrary, it is necessary that there should be acting upon that a majority of what shall constitute a quorum of that body.

I do not say it would invalidate the law thus passed, because it is a question of procedure, and the action by the legislative body controls. Courts recognize the right of legislative bodies to control and determine their procedure, and go a long way to sustain their actions thereunder. But the question of proper procedure is one devolving a distinct responsibility on the legislative body. In this sense I contend that the action of a quorum, counting the yeas and nays, is necessary to legally pass a law.

If you do otherwise you put it in the power of a minority to pass a bill, even though no quorum has voted. Frequently a minority can pass a bill. If there is a quorum present and the votes yea and nay when added together make more than a quorum, of course a majority of that quorum will pass a bill, although that majority may constitute a minority of the whole body. That is a general rule of parliamentary law; but I venture the assertion, Mr. President, that the book can not be found in which the proposition is not distinctly recognized, and in which there is not an utter absence of anything to the contrary, that a quorum is necessary in order to constitute legal action by a body. It is, of course, competent for a legislative body to determine, unless otherwise provided by law, what shall constitute a quorum and how the presence of that quorum can be ascertained.

When there is no call for the yeas and nays—we have that situation here all the time—the action of those who vote is assumed to be the action of the entire body. It is the assumption that there is a quorum present; it is the assumption when the vote is unchallenged that a majority of that quorum is voting in favor of the particular proposition; but that is an altogether different thing. When you come to a record vote, where every man is called upon to say how he votes and where there is no vote, which is a silent assent to a proposition, but where every vote is announced, a distinctly stated vote, then, I say, Mr. President, it is necessary that a quorum should vote upon such a question, and that without it you have a destruction of the fundamental proposition that a quorum is necessary to do business; that whenever the vote is had in a way to put each man upon his answer "yes" or "no," the yeas and nays added together must make a quorum, or it is not the legal action of the body. This, I contend, is the necessary rule in the absence of any rule to the contrary made by the body itself.

Mr. President, if we are going to have this practice, I insist that it should be in response to a rule adopted by this body, and not be left to the chance of an appeal from the Chair when there might not be a full attendance or when Senators would, in a measure, as is the case in every parliamentary body, be influenced by the particular question which is before the body, and sometimes political questions.

I presume you will find, even if you turn to the case where Senator Thurman ruled, that the Democrats were then in a majority, and I have no doubt the ruling was to carry out something which the Democrats then wanted. In the other House, Mr. President, their records are full of cases where such rulings were made, first by one party and then by another when in power. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] knows of the fact, having served there as long as he did, and the present occupant of the Chair knows of the fact from his service in that body, that there is a constant practice in the other House to make precedents which are the product of the interest of the moment—the political interest as well as the personal and selfish interest, probably, of parties who may be interested in a particular measure before the House the fate of which will be determined by the ruling.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I meant in the statement I made to cite the fact that Mr. Cockrell, who was one of the fairest-minded Senators we ever had, not on the passage of a bill, but on a motion, and a quorum failing, proceeded to count the Senate, and announced that a quorum was present. I repeat, it was not on the passage of a bill; and I am not controverting the Senator's contention on that point, but simply citing the fact that Mr. Cockrell, who I never knew in the long service I had with him here to do an unfair thing to either side of the Chamber, did count a quorum.

Mr. BACON. Well.

Mr. BAILEY. Is that in the book?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was on a vote. I will read the exact record.

Mr. BACON. That has been a matter which, while it has occasionally occurred, has never been conceded in this Chamber.

Mr. GALLINGER. This was on the 3d day of March, 1881:

MARCH 3, 1881.

While a motion to postpone further consideration of one bill for the purpose of considering another was pending, a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business was made, on which no quorum voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Cockrell) proceeded to count the Senate and announced the presence of a quorum.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to submit another thought in that connection, to show how dangerous is such a ruling as that which the Chair has just made. I understand with our present membership it now takes 48 to make a quorum—I believe I am correct in that. Say that there is a question before the Senate, that 19 Senators vote in the negative and 20 Senators vote in the affirmative, and 9 Senators announce pairs and refrain from voting. Say that it is a party question upon which the Democrats are voting on one side and the Republicans are voting on the other. In order that I may put the illustration in a way which will commend itself more forcibly to the Senators upon the other side, I will assume that 20 Democrats vote in favor of the motion, that 19 Republicans vote against it, and that 9 Republicans, every one of whom would, if at liberty to vote, vote with the 19, get up and say that they have pairs with Democrats; and that if they were not paired they would vote with the other Republicans, making 27 votes, and yet, under the ruling of the Chair, with 48 present——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will let me finish the sentence. With a quorum of 48 present and only 20 Democrats and 28 Republicans, the 20 Democrats would carry the day. Now I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. In the case cited by the Senator the difficulty is that not a majority of a quorum would have voted in favor of the proposition.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that to be different from a case where a majority of a quorum does vote.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no.

Mr. CURTIS. Rule IV decides what shall constitute a quorum.

Mr. BAILEY. No rule decides that; the Constitution decides it.

Mr. CURTIS. Of course, the Constitution provides as to that; but it is also set out in Rule IV of the Rules of the Senate. When a Senator announces from his place that he declines to vote because he is paired, frequently he announces that, if he were permitted to vote, he would vote yea or nay. It is then perfectly evident that he means to stay here to help make a quorum to do business. I think the Chair is perfectly right in holding that if a call of the yeas and nays does disclose that a majority of a quorum votes for a proposition and enough others to make a quorum announce that they would vote if at liberty to do so, but declined to vote because they are paired, a quorum is present, and the vote should be valid. I think the Chair has properly decided the question.

Mr. BACON. I will give another illustration to cover the Senator's contention. Suppose, Mr. President, there are present 25 Republicans, or, rather, I will say, 25 Democrats, in order not to make the same illustration I made before—suppose 25 Democrats are present and vote in favor of a proposition and 20 Republicans vote against it, that would make 45; and suppose there are 15 Republicans present, each of whom says he is paired with a Democrat and therefore refrains from voting. There would be a case where there would be a majority of a quorum voting; there would be 35 Republicans present, and yet under this ruling 25 Democrats would pass the bill.

It is still worse when it is not a party question, because in many such instances it is not known how an absent Senator would vote if present. Then with a large majority of Senators present favoring the passage of a law, if less than a quorum upon the call of the yeas and nays can legislate, a small unpaired minority can defeat its passage.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, the fundamental proposition in the case presented by the Senator from Kansas is that he assumes that in the absence of any specific rule by the body, a majority of a quorum voting for a measure is sufficient to pass it. I say that the Senator will not find any support for the proposition that in the absence of a particular rule, if less than a quorum votes, it is sufficient if those voting in the affirmative have in their favor a majority of a quorum. In the absence of a rule to the contrary it takes a quorum acting on the question. It takes a rule to say that a Senator present and not voting shall in a certain way be ascertained to be one of a quorum necessary to the passage of a bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the Senator from Georgia to hold that if a Senator, on a call of the yeas and nays, rises in his seat and states that he is paired with another Senator, and announces that if he were not paired he would vote yea or nay, as the case may be, that that is not a vote?

Mr. BACON. It is not a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. And it should not be counted?

Mr. BACON. And it should not be counted.

Mr. SMOOT. Either in making a quorum or on the passage of a bill?

Mr. BACON. I will admit that it should be counted as a quorum to the extent that it is not necessary that business should be suspended; in other words, there is a quorum present, but it is not sufficient to constitute the legal action of the body in the passage and enactment of a law.

The Senator from Utah has stated it very much more happily than I have; and that is, that in the absence of a rule to the contrary, the Senators voting must make up a quorum in order to constitute the legal action of the body. That is the only way in which the quorum is ascertained in the absence of a rule. In the case of a viva voce vote it is the presumption that a quorum is present and voting in acting upon a measure; but where there is a call of the yeas and nays there is no such presumption; it is an actuality; it is a fact; each Senator has said whether he is voting or not; and when he simply says, "If the Senator with whom I am paired were present, I would vote so-and-so," that does not constitute a vote.

Now, Mr. President, the suggestion I want to make is this: Let us settle this matter in the legal way, not by the construction of a presiding officer. This body has got a right to make a rule that way if it wishes to do so; but until it does so in the formal way that we legislate in regard to the rules, then I say this practice ought not to be pursued. So far as I am concerned, of course, I would not like to break a pair and would not do so under any ordinary circumstances; but I would very much prefer that some Senators on a vote that was not very material should take the liberty of disregarding their pairs than to see this ruling established as the rule of the Senate. Therefore I hope this matter may be passed over; let the Committee on Rules be charged with the duty of making a recommendation to this body, and then let the Senate determine shall it or shall it not be the rule of this body. If the Senate makes a rule that a quorum can be ascertained in this way as voting, we will know what to expect and to do. I trust that no such rule will be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Georgia will indulge the Chair for a moment it will be a very simple matter, and perhaps save time if, by unanimous consent, the Secretary be permitted to call the names of the Senators now present who were absent at the time the call of the yeas and nays was concluded. If there be no objection, that course will be followed and leave the other matter in abeyance.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. President, I want to say before that is done that I can not consent to the proposition that the Senate can determine by a rule whether or not a given number of votes is sufficient or insufficient to pass a bill.

Mr. BACON. I believe the Senator is right about that.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is a question of the Constitution.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is right, and I accept the suggestion. I think he is absolutely right about that; and that is a fundamental proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Secretary will call the names of those Senators who did not respond on the last call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. For what purpose?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To vote upon the proposition.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I do not object, but I want to make an inquiry after that matter is concluded. Let the roll call proceed, and then I will make the inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Secretary will call the names of those Senators who were absent on the former call of the yeas and nays.

The Secretary proceeded to call the names of the Senators who failed to respond when the names were called on the last yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. BORAH (when his name was called). I vote "yea."

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). Although my pair is absent, I understand he stated that if at liberty to vote he would vote "yea." I therefore will vote "yea."

Mr. CUMMINS (when his name was called). I vote "yea."

Mr. SHIVELY (when his name was called). I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] and therefore withhold my vote.

The Secretary concluded calling the names of the Senators who had not previously voted.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am requested to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] is paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote now is—yeas 37, nays 13. The yeas have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I think there should be some settled policy of the Senate in regard to this matter. The Senate ought to know what the rules are. On April 16, on a motion of my own to take up a bill the vote was 32 yeas and 14 nays, and the motion was declared lost because a quorum had not voted. On another yea-and-nay vote 30 voted in favor of taking up the bill and 4 against, and the motion was ruled as lost because a quorum had not voted. A roll call was immediately had and 61 Senators answered "present." Again, on April 26, upon a motion of my own on the same bill, there was a similar result. The RECORD shows that the Chair ruled each time that a quorum not having voted the motion was lost. The Vice President was not in the chair. Upon the last date the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] was in the chair, and upon the former date, if I remember rightly, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] was in the chair. The pairs announced on the first vote showed that there was a quorum present, and on the second vote the roll call showed that there were more than 60 Senators in the Chamber. I want the question settled one way or the other. I do not want the rule to prevail against a bill one day and in favor of it another day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as the Senator has called attention to the fact that I chanced to be in the chair on a certain occasion when a vote was taken on a particular bill, I want to say for myself—and I do not say it in any controversial spirit at all—that if I chanced to be in the chair when less than a quorum voted and pairs were announced by Senators sufficient in number, who, added to those voting, would have constituted a quorum, that was not my view of the question. I would have declared that a quorum had not voted. But other Senators in the history of the Government have ruled differently, as the Vice President did to-day. However, that is not my personal view.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am not questioning the wisdom of the Senator's ruling; but I do think there ought to be a consistent ruling, and not have a bill lost one day and have it carried the next day under exactly the same circumstances.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not think the question which has just been discussed is a question of rights and privileges amongst Senators and Representatives. I think it is a question of rights of constituencies as represented by them. It seems to me that it would be a very good thing if the Senate would provide a rule whereby when a yea-and-nay vote was had each Senator could, under the rule, respond either "yea" or "nay," or "present" or "present and paired"; or, to go still further, "present for the purpose of being counted to make a quorum, but paired," adding what he pleased to that statement.

The idea, it seems to me, is this: I have a right here to represent my constituents by voting or by refraining from voting, as I think best in their interest; by helping to make a quorum or by refusing to help to make a quorum, as I think best in their interest. If, at any time, I am in favor of or opposed to a bill, but at the same time am willing to be counted for the purpose of making a quorum, representing my constituents, the rule ought to provide that I could rise in my place and say, "Present, but paired with So-and-so," and the rule should be understood as giving a right to count me for a quorum when I made that announcement. In other words, if I think it is to the interest of my constituents to vote "yea" on a bill, I vote that way. If I think it is to their interest to vote "nay," I vote that way. If I think it is to their interest for me to sit in the Chamber and not be counted to make a quorum, I ought to have that right. If I think it is to their interest to sit in the Chamber and ask to be recorded to make a quorum, while being excused from voting because I am paired, I ought to have that right.

I merely rose to say that I hope the matter will go to the Committee on Rules, and that they will fix it so that in addition to the present responses to the roll call a Senator may rise in his place and say "present, and desirous to be counted to make a quorum," and then "paired," or whatever he chooses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Capitol police," on page 13, line 13, after the words "in all," to strike out "$41,250" and insert "$78,150," so as to make the clause read:

For captain, $1,800; 3 lieutenants, at $1,200 each; 2 special officers, at $1,200 each; and 67 privates, at $1,050 each; one-half of said privates to be selected by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and one-half by the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives; in all, $78,150, one half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 16, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$200" and insert "$300," so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses, $300, one half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Library of Congress," on page 24, line 21, before the words "in all," to insert "photostat operator, $600," and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$20,120" and insert "$20,720," so as to make the clause read:

General administration: Librarian of Congress, $6,500; chief assistant librarian, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,500; Librarian's secretary, $1,800; clerk, $1,200; clerk (assistant to chief clerk), $1,000; stenographers and typewriters—one at $1,200, one at $720; messenger, $840; junior messenger, $360; photostat operator, $600; in all, $20,720.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 20, before the word "each," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,800"; in line 21, after the word "blind," to strike out "(formerly in free public library)" and insert ": Provided, That pavilion No. 7 shall be used for the accommodation of the blind; two at the charging desk, at $1,080 each"; in line 25, before the word "at," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "five" and insert "three"; and on page 26, line 9, after the words "in all," to strike out "$52,500" and insert "$53,460," so as to make the clause read:

Reading rooms (including evening service) and special collections: Superintendent of reading room, $3,000; assistants—2 at $1,800 each, 5 at $1,200 each, including 1 in division for the blind: Provided, That pavilion No. 7 shall be used for the accommodation of the blind; 2 at the charging desk, at $1,080 each, 3 at $900 each, 10 at $720 each, 2 at $600 each; stenographer and typewriter, $900; attendant, Senate reading room, $900; attendants, Representatives' reading room—1 at $900 and 1 at $720; attendants—2 in cloakrooms at $720 each, 1 in Toner Library, $900, 1 in Washingtonian Library, $900, 2 for gallery and alcoves, at $480 each; telephone operator, $600; 4 junior messengers, at $360 each; 2 watchmen, at $720 each; evening service, 5 assistants, at $900 each; 15 assistants, at $720 each; 2 assistants, at $600 each; in all, $53,460.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Is it understood that this bill is being read now? If it is, the copy that I have is sadly deficient. If it is understood that part of the bill is being read, I have nothing to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue to read the bill in full.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 20, after the word "each," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "eighteen"; and in line 25, after the words "in all," to strike out "$95,180" and insert "$96,980," so as to make the clause read:

Copyright office, under the direction of the Librarian of Congress: Register of copyrights, $4,000; assistant register of copyrights, $3,000; clerks—3 at $2,000 each, 2 at $1,800 each, 7 at $1,600 each, 1 at $1,500, 8 at $1,400 each, 10 at $1,200 each, 10 at $1,000 each, 18 at $900 each, 2 at $800 each, $10 at $720 each, 4 at $600 each, 2 at $480 each; 4 junior messengers, at $360 each. Arrears, special service: Three clerks, at $1,200 each; porter, $720; junior messenger, $360; in all, $96,980.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 18, on page 28.

Mr. HEYBURN. I give notice at this time that I will move to strike out, in lines 14 and 15, the words "within the discretion of the Librarian."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Inasmuch as the bill is now being read for committee amendments, I do not intend to move the amendment now, but merely to give notice of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the custody, care, and maintenance of Library building and grounds, on page 30, line 8, before the word "charwomen," to strike out "forty-five" and insert "forty-seven," and in line 13, after the words "in all," to strike out "$71,705" and insert "$72,185," so as to read:

Assistant mistress of charwomen, $300; 47 charwomen; chief engineer, $1,500; assistant engineers—1 at $1,200, 3 at $900 each; electrician, $1,200; machinists—1 at $1,000, 1 at $900; 2 wiremen and 1 plumber, at $900 each; 3 elevator conductors and 10 skilled laborers, at $720 each; in all, $72,185.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 25, after the word "thereto," to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$15,000," so as to make the clause read:

For furniture, including partitions, screens, shelving, and electrical work pertaining thereto, $15,000.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, for my part, I should like to know some reason for raising that amount and making it three times as great as the House reported.

Mr. WARREN. What is the Senator's inquiry?

Mr. REED. The bill as it comes from the House appropriates $5,000 for this item, at the bottom of page 30. The committee proposes to raise it to $15,000. I should like to know some reason for it.

Mr. WARREN. The estimate explains the great portion of it. The House evidently did not take into consideration the electrical work that has to be done there. The Senate committee, after investigating the matter, decided that they could not get along with less than $15,000.

Mr. REED. It is new work.

Mr. WARREN. It is mainly new work, and also repairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Executive," on page 31, line 17, after the words "United States," to strike out "Secretary, at the rate of $7,500 per annum until March 4, 1913, and at the rate of $6,000 per annum on and after March 4, 1913," and insert "Secretary, $7,500"; on page 32, line 2, before the word "laborers," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$71,336.66" and insert "$72,540," so as to read:

For the following in the office of the President of the United States: Secretary, $7,500; executive clerk, $5,000; chief clerk, $4,000; appointment clerk, $3,500; record clerk, $2,500; 2 expert stenographers, at $2,500 each; accountant, $2,500; 2 correspondents, at $2,250 each; disbursing clerk, $2,000; clerks—3 at $2,000 each, 6 of class 4, 2 of class 3, 5 of class 2, 2 of class 1; 1 clerk-messenger, $1,000; 2 messengers, at $900 each; 2 messengers; 3 laborers, at $720 each; in all, $72,540.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 13, after the word "President," to strike out "for services rendered, and articles delivered and for use, within the District of Columbia," so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses of the Executive Office, including stationery therefor, as well as record books, telegrams, telephones, books for library, furniture and carpets for offices, horses, carriages, harness, automobiles, expenses of stables, including labor and miscellaneous items, to be expended in the discretion of the President, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Civil Service Commission," on page 32, line 23, before the words "of class 2," to strike out "twenty-eight" and insert "twenty-nine"; in line 24, before the words "of class 1," to strike out "thirty-eight" and insert "thirty-nine"; in line 25, before the words "at $1,000 each," to strike out "thirty-two" and insert "thirty-three"; on page 33, line 2, before the word "watchmen," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in the same line, after the word "watchmen," to strike out "elevator conductor, $720," and insert "2 elevator conductors, at $720 each"; in line 4, before the word "laborers," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in the same line, before the words "messenger boys," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 5, after the word "each," to insert "3 charwomen"; and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "two hundred and twenty-seven thousand two hundred and thirty dollars" and insert "two hundred and thirty-four thousand and ten dollars," so as to make the clause read:

For commissioner, acting as president of the commission, $4,500; 2 commissioners, at $4,000 each; chief examiner, $3,000; secretary, $2,500; assistant chief examiner, $2,250; 3 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; examiner, $2,400; 3 examiners, at $2,000 each; 4 examiners, at $1,800 each; clerks—4 of class 4, 21 of class 3, 29 of class 2, 39 of class 1, 33 at $1,000 each; 20 clerks, at $900 each; messenger; assistant messenger; engineer, $840; telephone switchboard operator; 2 firemen, at $720 each; 3 watchmen; 2 elevator conductors, at $720 each; 4 laborers; 4 messenger boys, at $360 each; 3 charwomen; in all, $234,010.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming why these increases were made in the bill as passed by the House. There is an increase of one clerk of class 2, one of class 1, one clerk at $3,000, an increase of one watchman, an increase of one elevator conductor, an increase of one laborer, and one messenger boy.

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator knows, the commission is just moving into new quarters, and at the time the original estimate was made they did not, apparently, take that into consideration. While we did not give them any large fraction of what was finally estimated and what they desired, the committee, after adducing all the evidence they could, believed that this was the very minimum sum which would enable them to handle the business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are moving into new, rented quarters?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; they have moved into an entirely new building.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They rented a larger building, and therefore had to have more employees?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; they will have to have more in the way of another elevator, and so forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming how long he expects the Senate to remain in session?

Mr. WARREN. Probably not over five minutes.

I will say that I should like to complete the bill down to the middle of the next page, and then I shall be willing that the Senate adjourn.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 12, page 34.

Mr. WARREN. The hour is late, and as we are now to the place in the bill where the items for the State Department will be taken up, I desire to ask permission to have printed in the RECORD, and also as a document, a communication from the Secretary of State transmitting a statement relative to the continuance of the Bureau of Trade Relations in the Department of State, which by right should have been included in the Senate hearings, but for the convenience of the subcommittee it was retained in committee. I will ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and also as a document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor is entered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BUREAU OF TRADE RELATIONS.

[Senate Document No. 761, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 25, 1912.

MY DEAR SENATOR WARREN: When I had the pleasure of appearing before your subcommittee day before yesterday you were good enough to suggest that, owing to the impression of a duplication of work between the Department of State and the Department of Commerce and Labor, I should confer with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and with the President in order that you might be given such explanations or suggestions by me as would enable the committee to carry out its purpose of eliminating duplications, if any important ones were found to exist, while at the same time conserving and strengthening the machinery for the promotion of our great foreign trade.

I have had a conversation with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, but Mr. Nagel showed a reluctance to address himself to the subject in so far as it passed the direct concern of his own department. On the other hand, the President's absence has made it impossible for me to discuss this subject with him. In these circumstances, realizing the urgency of your committee's work and desiring to facilitate it so far as possible along the line of your suggestion, I have caused to be prepared the inclosed memorandum, which frankly discusses the subject which you raised. In transmitting this memorandum, in the hope that it may be of some use to your committee, I must particularly emphasize the fact that the memorandum simply sets forth the views of this department.

It has been suggested, I understand, by your committee that the report of the Economy and Efficency Commission may throw some light upon the subject under consideration, but the shortness of the time and the vast importance of the matters at stake has made me reluctant to await that report. Meanwhile I shall transmit a copy of this memorandum to the President.

If I can serve you in any other way, pray command me.

Yours, very sincerely,

P. C. KNOX.

The Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

MAY 25, 1912.

It was kindly explained to the Department of State by the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Appropriations that it was desired to continue and to strengthen thoroughly efficient governmental instrumentalities for the promotion of the foreign trade interests of the United States, and that beyond this the sole wish was to make sure that there should be no unnecessary duplications of work.

The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, as it now stands, takes away from the Department of State some $94,000, and by doing so destroys not only the Bureau of Trade Relations, but the Division of Latin-American Affairs, the Division of Far Eastern Affairs, the Division of Near Eastern Affairs, the Division of Western European Affairs, the Division of Information, the office of Director of the Consular Service, the office of counselor, the office of resident diplomatic officer, an assistant solicitor, a law clerk, etc.—in fact, completely wipes out the new organization with which alone the modern methods and useful activities of the foreign-service establishment, as now constituted, can be continued.

To speak first of the Bureau of Trade Relations, it is to be observed that the total cost of that bureau is now only $29,220. Of this total, 59 per cent is eliminated by the bill as it now stands. That is to say, $17,300 are taken away from the Bureau of Trade Relations with the effect of eliminating its chief and its most expert employees.

It has become quite clear to the Department of State that there are several misapprehensions as to the Bureau of Trade Relations. The prototype of that bureau was established in 1856 and has since functioned continuously under different names. Prior to 1903 the consular reports and foreign trade statistics were prepared in this bureau for publication, and were printed in the Department of State. In 1903 this function of printing, publishing, and promulgating commercial information to the business community of the United States was given to the newly created Department of Commerce and Labor, where it has since been carried on in the Bureau of Manufactures. By the same organic act creating the new Department of Commerce and Labor, the old Bureau of Foreign Commerce of the Department of State was provided for, an office of chief of bureau being created with the specific functions of formulating for the instruction of consular officers the requests of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and preparing from the dispatches of consular officers for transmission to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor such information as pertains to the work of the Department of Commerce and Labor. In view of the historic fact that the prototype of this section of the Department of State had been in existence for some 47 years and had been occupied, naturally, with the commercial functions peculiar to the Diplomatic and Consular Department of the Government, it had never for a moment been suggested that this stipulation was intended to be a complete indication of the work of the Bureau of Trade Relations or should affect in any way the commercial functions inherent in and inseparable from the Department of State as a foreign office.

Foreign trade is fostered and promoted by the activities of diplomatic and consular officers. Consular officers have many duties affecting official international relations and do much useful work, as at present during the Mexican disturbances; as in China, Turkey, Persia, and Siam, with their extraterritorial functions; as in any country in case of local disturbances or in keeping the department and their Diplomatic Service superiors informed on local conditions. They are thus a necessary part of the foreign service and inevitably are subordinates of the Department of State. Nevertheless, the main part of their work is commercial.

So, too, diplomatic officers must give their attention and energetic efforts to a thousand negotiations affecting the award of Government and other contracts, the removing of discriminatory treatment, the securing of equality of opportunity, and so forth. From these few words it will be quite evident that in the field of foreign trade the Department of State is the only governmental agency in position to do the main work, from the point of view of already having the machinery as necessary to foreign intercourse, as well as from the standpoint of international usage, custom, and, indeed, the whole logic of the situation.

Most governments have some department of commerce or industry, but the government of every important country has in its foreign office an organization corresponding to the Bureau of Trade Relations of the Department of State, and it is upon that office that it mainly relies in the sphere of foreign trade expansion. For example, in the foreign office of Germany there is a trade division, which disburses between $100,000 and $120,000 annually, distributed as follows: One director, at $5,000 salary and $2,500 extra for expenses; 7 assistants, who receive salaries ranging from $2,000 to $3,000; 6 permanent secretaries, at from $1,300 to $1,900; 14 experts and 30 registrars, at from $750 to $1,600; 6 assessors, at $1,000 each; and about 30 clerks. Traveling and other necessary expenses are paid out of the general foreign office contingent fund and naturally vary from year to year.

Again, France has a department of political and commercial affairs which is the more important of the two departments of the foreign office and is divided into 10 bureaus and subdepartments under the immediate directions of departmental directors and bureau chiefs. There is also a commercial and financial counselor, who, with the assistance of an attaché, has control of commercial and financial negotiations, preparation of commercial treaties, and the general commercial and financial relations of France.

Although the foreign trade of Austria-Hungary is small in comparison with that of the United States, the commercial bureau of the Austrian foreign office costs annually over $32,000. The foreign offices of Great Britain, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Japan—in fact, of all important commercial countries—have, as a matter of course, bureaus of trade relations in their foreign offices which correspond to the Bureau of Trade Relations in the State Department of the United States. This is irrespective of the fact that in all those countries there is another department analogous to the Department of Commerce and Labor, which has also certain commercial functions.

The view of the Department of State has always been that, in addition to its field in matters of domestic commerce and manufacture, a domestic department, like the Department of Commerce and Labor, and specifically its Bureau of Manufactures, would deal with the home end of foreign trade and the Department of State with the foreign end. This line of demarcation appears entirely clear. The Department of State, with its hundreds of diplomatic and consular officers, carries on the commercial missionary work in the foreign field. The Bureau of Manufactures, through its various activities, has the field for a propaganda of education and helpfulness in bringing the American manufacturer to take advantage of the opportunities of the foreign field.

As to the suggestion that there is at present duplication, a careful analysis will show that duplication, so far as it exists, is unimportant. The Department of State must edit and digest for use in an infinite number of directions all the commercial reports of its diplomatic and consular officers. It must also go over these with a view to the elimination of anything the publication of which would be detrimental from a diplomatic point of view. Diplomatic and consular dispatches of this kind bear directly and indirectly upon the many commercial and other negotiations on foot to secure business, to meet competition, or for any other purpose peculiar to the foreign field. What is suitable for use by the Bureau of Manufactures is sent to the Department of Commerce and Labor and there edited for the distinctive purposes of that department. These two processes of editing, being for different purposes and of different nature, seem scarcely to be duplications any more than is duplication when the same raw material passes through different machines each designed to extract particular elements from the original material. The Bureau of Manufactures would presumably cull from such correspondence also much information useful to its other commercial work, quite aside from the field of foreign trade.

There may be a slight increase of clerical work due to the constant stream of correspondence between the two departments, but this is insignificant and probably inevitable, because it seems obvious that the Department of State can not any more be a department of industry and commerce in the domestic sense than the Department of Commerce and Labor can be a department of state in the sense of a foreign office.

There may be a certain duplication in the existing arrangement, by which the Department of Commerce and Labor sends special agents to cover fields already covered by consular officers, but this is not always so. For example, it is the view of the Department of State that when, on some special occasion, the interests of American manufacturers require a complete technical report upon some great industry, like the chemical industry, or any such, that the Government of the United States ought to select from private life a thoroughly qualified expert and send him for a limited period of service to do the work; the Department of Commerce and Labor in such case to select the expert and the Department of State to accredit and attach him in some capacity to the proper embassy, legation, or consulate general. This would be done much as military and naval attachés are attached to embassies by the Department of State, but without prejudice to their duties to the War and Navy Departments. Except in such cases, the Department of State, for its part, knows of no need for such agents, and thinks that the Diplomatic and Consular Service can perform the entire work of the foreign field. If a commercial specialist for general trade matters is required at one of our embassies or legations, the Department of State should have sufficient appropriation to supply one.

It is the practice of the Department of State to have American consuls visit American business communities, in order directly and in person to impart useful commercial information as to the countries where such consuls serve. It is the purpose of the Department of State to suggest that this practice be in future changed by having such consular officers make these tours within the United States under the formal auspices of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

This change, together with the placing of all agents in the foreign field under the formal auspices of the Department of State, would remove the only known case in which there appears to the Department of State to be at present an overlapping of the functions of the two departments. This would leave the whole foreign field to the Department of State, and the whole domestic field to the Department of Commerce and Labor, and this is the logical line of cleavage.

It will be recalled that the organic act creating the Department of Commerce and Labor gives to that department the duty to "foster and promote" the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States. Inasmuch as practically all the instrumentalities for fostering American foreign trade in the foreign field are immemorially and inevitably part and parcel of the Department of State, it has never been seriously suggested, so far as is known, that the words of the act were construed in anyone's mind as designed to disturb the usual channels of promoting foreign trade, or to place the responsibility for promoting foreign trade upon another department entirely lacking in the requisite instrumentalities for all phases of the work abroad, as is any department other than the one which directs the Diplomatic and Consular Service. It has, therefore, always been believed by the Department of State that it was the intent of the act to put upon the Department of Commerce and Labor the distinct duty not only of promoting domestic commerce and industry, but also of fostering and promoting foreign trade indirectly by the important work of ascertaining the needs of the home manufacturer and merchant, communicating them to the Department of State, and, in turn, promulgating among American business men the sum total of suggestive and valuable knowledge acquired by it as a domestic department, as well as that gained for it by the Department of State, which covers the field of foreign relations and foreign commercial affairs.

If more information were necessary to carry conviction of the fact that a powerful Bureau of Trade Relations in the Department of State is indispensable, it could readily be supplied. It was suggested, as the result of a misapprehension, that the enlargement of the Bureau of Trade Relations, made in 1909, was merely due to the work imposed by the maximum-minimum tariff law. On the contrary, that work was an incident, the main work being the general promotion of American foreign trade. Moreover, as to tariff arrangements, favorable ones can only be maintained through constant vigilance, and plans for future improved tariff arrangements with foreign countries require constant study and preparation far in advance. All the administrative discriminations, such as those against dried fruits, cottonseed oil, etc., require the assiduous application of commercial diplomacy. The award of Government or other contracts, the collection of commercial data by hundreds of consular officers, the confidential reports of commercial opportunities—these and many other activities can only be directed by the Department of State, and with the aid of a powerful Bureau of Trade Relations.

Of course the wiping out of the four politico-geographical divisions of Latin-American affairs, far eastern, near eastern, and western European affairs, the destruction of the Division of Information, and the elimination of the Director of the Consular Service and several other offices, without exaggeration, would completely cripple the diplomatic arm of the Department of State, and their restoration is simply indispensable if the Department of State is to carry, with any efficiency, the heavy responsibility of our foreign relations.

With conditions such as are found to-day, for example, in China, Mexico, and Cuba, where so many Americans are concerned, this hardly requires demonstration, and it is well known that with diplomatic and commercial relations with the whole world there are never times when the Department of State of the United States can afford to be deprived of the machinery for looking after American interests.

The wiping out of all these divisions has, however, a direct bearing upon the efficiency of the Bureau of Trade Relations. For example, if there is in a Latin-American country a large piece of business which we hope will come to the United States, the Bureau of Trade Relations is assisted and advised by the Division of Latin-American Affairs, which supplies minute knowledge as to conditions in the country concerned which bear upon the business in hand. The piece of business may involve a contract, raising some questions of international law and requiring consultation with the law officers of the department. It may, through impinging upon the interests of some other country, raise purely diplomatic questions of policy. In a word, all these instrumentalities are interdependent, and none can have its full efficiency without the other. As to the Bureau of Trade Relations, without it and the other divisions which the bill now eliminates, the consular and diplomatic services would be, in their efforts on behalf of American trade, like a strong body from which the head had been lopped, depriving it of its directing and guiding energy. It is an indisputable fact, and one recognized by the uniform practice of all first-class commercial powers, that no other department whatever is able to take the place of the department charged with foreign affairs in the promotion of foreign trade.

Mr. WARREN. In laying the bill aside I wish to say that I shall seek to take up the bill in the morning the first thing after the morning business unless for some reason the Senate may desire to do otherwise.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE ELBERT H. HUBBARD.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD, late a Representative from the State of Iowa, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had appointed Mr. HAUGEN, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. GOOD, Mr. PROUTY, Mr. PICKETT, Mr. KENDALL, Mr. WOODS, Mr. TOWNER, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. GREEN, Mr. LLOYD, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. LOBECK, and Mr. AYRES the committee on the part of the House to attend the funeral of the deceased.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

House resolution 571.

Resolved, That the House has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD, for eight years a Representative from the eleventh district of the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed by the Speaker to attend the funeral at Sioux City, Iowa, and that the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for properly carrying out the provisions of this resolution.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it becomes my duty to announce to the Senate the death of Mr. HUBBARD, late a Representative in Congress from the State of Iowa, and I submit the resolutions I send to the desk and ask for their adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa offers resolutions which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolutions (S. Res. 328), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. ELBERT H. HUBBARD, late a Representative from the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That a committee of eight Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join a committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed as the committee on the part of the Senate, under the second resolution, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. KENYON, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. BORAH, Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. GRONNA, and Mr. HITCHCOCK.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to, and (at 6 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 5, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 4, 1912.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee Almighty God, our heavenly Father, that in the press and push of life's activities we may pause for a moment, enter the holy of holies, and commune with Thee. It is not what we pray for, since Thou knowest our needs better than we know them. It is the touch of spirit with spirit, the communion of soul with soul, which exalts, ennobles, purifies, and fits us for the work before us. So touch us with Thy spirit; so guide us that our work may be efficient and well-pleasing in Thy sight now and always in the spirit of the Master.

And now, O Father, we are touched by the sudden death of another one of our Members. Help us and encourage us to go forward with new resolutions, that we may fulfill our destiny, and when the time comes we may be ready to enter upon that higher life. Comfort, we beseech Thee, the friends and family of the deceased Member, and help them to look forward with faith and confidence to a higher and better life. In Christ Jesus, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw resolution No. 204 from further consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw House joint resolution 204. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, just what does the request mean?

The SPEAKER. It means the gentleman withdraws his resolution about the constitutional amendment.

Mr. MANN. That he withdraws it from present consideration?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. From further consideration at this session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

COTTON SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means. By direction of that committee I report back to the House the bill H. R. 25034, a bill to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton. (H. Rept. 829.)

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 25034) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire, according with the understanding with the committee, to have until Thursday to file the views of the minority.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, there will be no objection on our part to the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to file the views of the minority on or before Thursday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and myself, to be equally divided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled by himself on one side and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] on the other. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it the intention of the gentleman to give the Members of the House general leave to print or to give a long time for general debate on this bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Personally I shall be very glad to have debate close before we adjourn to-day. There are not many requests for time on this side of the House. I understand there are more demands on the other side of the House.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Why does not the gentleman ask for an arrangement as to time and general permission to print? There are many of us who do not want to waste the time of the committee, but who do wish to print.

Mr. GARNER. On this bill—on the subjects contained in this bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be arranged later.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will not have any trouble in getting recognition for the purpose of obtaining leave to print.

Mr. CANNON. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. The request is that the gentleman from New York shall control the time on one side and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] control it on the other. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. One moment, Mr. Speaker. I have just come in. There is no limit fixed for debate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. I wish to state, however, so far as I know there is but an hour and a half requested on this side of the House outside of whatever I may use, and I do not anticipate or expect that I shall be compelled to use very much time.

Mr. CANNON. I have applications for five hours. That would make it six hours and a half.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentlemen might stir up some debate——

Mr. CANNON. The matter of closing debate, I suppose, will come up later.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thought we might determine when to close debate a little bit later. It is just possible we may be able to close debate before the end of the day; have six hours' debate, perhaps.

Mr. CANNON. That is a matter to come up subsequently.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1913, and for other purposes, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield a moment to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is desirous of leaving the city?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] so much time as may be necessary.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I admit that in the last few years I have not invariably acted either with the insurgent or with the regular wing of the Republican Party. For that reason it is natural for my constituents frequently to ask, "How does GARDNER stand?" To anyone who wishes to know how GARDNER stands I say, "Read this and you will learn his position on the great questions of the day." Fifteen months ago, on the floor of this House, on March 4, 1911, I made the following remarks:

PARCEL POST.

I favor the establishment of a parcel-post system on a scale of charges which shall yield no loss to the Government.

RAILROADS.

I believe that the rates charged by railroads should be regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission so as to yield a reasonable return on the value of each road. To that end I favor a physical valuation of every railroad in the country, including its terminals.

LABOR.

I favor a workmen's compensation act on progressive lines, together with an improved provision for employers' liability.

I favor rigid inspection of dangerous apparatus, and I believe that the use of all approved safety appliances should be required by law.

I am opposed to child labor, and I believe that the labor of women should be carefully circumscribed.

I am in favor of the extension of the national 8-hour law so as to include contracts made by the National Government, as recommended in President Taft's last annual message and as provided in the bill introduced by Representative GARDNER of New Jersey, chairman of the Committee on Labor.

I favor such an anti-injunction law as was advocated by the last Republican national platform, but I do not favor the drastic anti-injunction law provided in the Little bill.

TARIFF.

I believe in a protective tariff which shall measure the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit for the American producer. In my opinion, this means a high tariff.

I favor a permanent tariff commission, such as is provided in the Longworth bill.

I do not favor tariff revision schedule by schedule. In my opinion, this would result in tariff destruction schedule by schedule.

RECIPROCITY.

I favor reciprocity in noncompetitive articles only. If the people desire lower tariff rates, they should be obtained by legislation, not by entangling treaties and contracts which favor one nation and antagonize many nations.

CONSERVATION.

I favor additional legislation for the conservation of our national resources.

TWO CHANGES IN VIEWS.

So much for my statement of 15 months ago. My views are the same to-day except in two respects: First, it may sometimes be necessary to revise tariff schedules separately. When necessary I approve it. Second, I favor the Clayton anti-injunction bill, although it contains certain provisions by no means in accord with the views of the last Republican national platform.

I have a few other matters on which I wish to make myself clear.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES.

I favor the Borah bill for a commission of industrial relations.

IMMIGRATION.

I favor laws which will radically cut down the number of immigrants entering this country. To begin with, I favor a law excluding all immigrants who can not read, but other laws must follow. I favor the Dillingham-Burnett immigration-restriction bill.

THE RECALL OF JUDGES, ETC.

I am opposed to the recall of judges and to the recall of judicial decisions.

THE TRUSTS.

I am not prepared at this time to offer any opinion as to the best way to deal with the trusts. However, when the Stanley committee reports on the United States Steel Corporation it is my intention to discuss this question with some elaboration. For the present I shall confine myself to this observation, to wit, whether or not dissolution be the true method of dealing with trusts, I am definitely opposed to dissolutions which do not dissolve. Therefore I favor the passage of the Cummins bill calling on the Supreme Court of the United States to pass upon the recent dissolution of the Tobacco Trust.

CONCLUSION.

Obviously there are many public questions which I have not touched upon. On some of them my views are not as yet by any means matured. I have tried, however, to touch on the leading questions of the day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the sundry civil appropriation bill now under consideration is the last of the regular appropriation bills. There remains in this session to present only the general deficiency bill; then the work of the House in its initial stages, so far as providing funds for the maintenance of the Government is concerned, will be ended. The bill as recommended by the committee carries $109,577,414.40. The estimates submitted to the Congress in the regular Book of Estimates, including specific appropriations for public-building projects which were not carried into the totals, but which must be included in the general total of estimates for proper consideration under this bill, aggregate $142,006,303.25, and there has been submitted additional a supplemental estimate aggregating $9,984,803.62. The total estimates considered in preparing the bill amounted to $151,991,106.87. The bill is a reduction under the estimates of $42,413,692.47, and under the appropriations in the current law of $33,060,629.74.

Mr. Chairman, the recommendations contained in this bill do not in any measure include all of the reductions that might and may yet be made in the various recommendations for the conduct of that portion of the public service which is provided for in this bill. At the outset of the Congress, however, I asserted that the Democratic House would recommend in every instance every dollar required to enable the public service to be efficiently administered. The committee, if anything, has given the benefit of the doubt to the various departments, bureaus, and divisions, rather than by arbitrary reductions in recommendations risk crippling or impairing in any degree the efficient administration of the public service. It had been hoped that certain information would have been submitted to the Congress at a sufficiently early date to have enabled the committee to have gone more thoroughly into certain questions connected with the administration of the public service for the purpose of recommending definite reforms.

During the past two years there has been appropriated the sum of $175,000 to enable the President to employ experts in and out of the public service for the purpose of inquiring into the methods of administering the public service and to recommend such changes as might be deemed advisable in order to permit important reforms to be put into effect. In the sundry civil appropriation act for the current year a provision was inserted requiring a report to be submitted to the Congress by the 31st day of December, 1911, of the results obtained to that date, and recommendations based thereon, so that the Congress might have sufficiently early the benefit of any information acquired by the persons employed by the President under these appropriations. These reports were not submitted within the time designated. Some 23 or more reports affecting various branches of the public service were submitted to the President by his experts about the time fixed. For many reasons it was deemed advisable by the President to submit these reports and the recommendations based thereon to the various branches of the public service that might be affected thereby. Examination of those reports and of the recommendations, and the preparation of comments thereon by the services affected, occupied considerable time, so that in the preparation of the legislative appropriation bill the committee, while it had information that certain recommendations had been made as to changes in the public service, was not in a position with the information in its possession to act intelligently upon the recommendations. While perhaps the information might have been of considerable benefit had it been in the possession of the committee sufficiently early to have been utilized in the preparation of the bill, the committee, in the consideration of that bill, was unable safely to follow recommendations made or to go into matters suggested in that spirit and with that thoroughness that would have justified it in basing recommendations upon the information furnished. In connection with the preparation of the present bill, certain very drastic, revolutionary, and far-reaching changes in the public service were submitted by these experts. They did not come at a time that enabled the committee, in view of the extreme character of the recommendations, to obtain the information that would have justified in many of these respects the committee in adopting the recommendations or in attempting to determine whether the recommendations were wise. Many reforms that might have been initiated have been held back until opportunity could be had to study other suggestions of reforms originating with these experts. Some additional reforms might properly have been adopted, but all were permitted to stay in abeyance until a later date, when time sufficient to enable the committee to take under consideration all the information available and all of the proposed changes would result in such matured recommendations as would result in substantial improvement of the public service. So that, Mr. Chairman, it is not to be understood that this bill contains all of the reforms or all of the retrenchments or economies that are possible in the various services affected by it.

The committee has been engaged in the consideration of this bill since about the 4th day of March, industriously and earnestly and thoroughly. It has been handicapped to some extent by the fact that there has been a very great disregard of the law by the executive departments of the Government in respect to additional or supplemental estimates. The law provides that all estimates for the public service shall be submitted to Congress in the regular Book of Estimates at the opening of the session, and that no additional or supplemental estimates shall be submitted unless to carry out laws subsequently enacted by Congress or by reason of some unanticipated or unforeseen emergencies which require appropriations and which, in the opinion of the head of the department, will be imperatively necessary for the public service; and in such cases the head of the department is required to state the reasons which, in his opinion, make it imperative that the appropriations should be made and of the failure to include the estimates in the regular Book of Estimates.

I have heretofore called attention in the House to one of the most flagrant instances in which this law has not only been ignored, but in which Congress has been treated with the utmost disrespect. The Secretary of the Navy submitted a supplemental estimate of $1,000,000 for the Bureau of Equipment, for wireless telegraph stations in different parts of the world. In compliance with the law he undertook to state the reasons which, in his opinion, made it imperative that the appropriation should be made for next year and the reason of his failure to include the estimate in the regular Book of Estimates. The only statement made was that this estimate was not submitted in the regular Book of Estimates because of the desire to keep the estimates as low as possible.

It should be remembered that there is a statute which requires the Secretary of the Treasury, before transmitting the estimates of appropriations to Congress at the beginning of the session, to cause to be prepared an estimate of the probable revenues during the next ensuing fiscal year, and in the event that the estimated revenues will not be sufficient to meet the estimated requirements for the public service in the way of appropriations, to submit both estimates to the President, so that the President may inform the Congress in what way the appropriations for the next ensuing fiscal year may be reduced, so as to bring them within the estimated revenues without impairing the efficiency of the public service, or else to recommend to Congress new methods for obtaining the additional revenue required. If the heads of departments may take a million-dollar item here and there and withhold such items for the purpose of keeping the estimates of appropriations down, and withhold such items until after the regular estimates have been transmitted, and then transmit them with such impertinent explanations, the whole purpose of the law is destroyed. It is a matter of great regret to me that any committee of the House should have seriously considered an estimate submitted in that way and based a recommendation upon it.

I have in mind, Mr. Chairman, another instance where a supplemental estimate was submitted for increases of compensation to certain employees. The Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, in the War Department, in his annual report called attention to certain increases of compensation which in his opinion should be given to certain employees in his bureau. In the regular estimates no recommendation for these increases was contained, but subsequently a supplemental estimate was submitted in which these increases in compensation were requested, and in that supplemental estimate he stated, as an explanation for his failure to include them in the regular Book of Estimates, that when the estimates for his bureau were being prepared, he was under the impression that it was the policy of the administration not to recommend any increases of salary or new places except where it was absolutely essential for the public service, so that the estimates might be kept down as low as possible; but in the meantime he had ascertained that he was mistaken as to the policy, that in some way he had been misled, and that under those circumstances he had transmitted a supplemental estimate for the increased compensation of the employees of his bureau.

Unless some attempt is made by the administration to obey the law, and to be honest with the Congress and the country in the preparation of the estimates, it is absolutely impossible to determine when the estimates are submitted to Congress whether they are actually the views or the opinion of the administration as to the moneys required for the public service, or whether they are merely a haphazard putting together of estimates with the intention, subsequently, after the first discussion of appropriations and probable revenues has taken place, to submit largely increased estimates. It is not a partisan matter, but is one of those things as to which men ought to join, regardless of politics, in an attempt to put the business of the Government upon a satisfactory and sane basis.

Mr. Chairman, it may be interesting to the House at this time to call attention to some facts in connection with the appropriation bills during the present session and during the last regular session of Congress.

The total of the annual appropriation bills for 1912, as reported to the House, was $869,507,292.67.

The total amount of the regular annual bills as reported to the House during this session is $829,772,598.57, a reduction of $39,734,694 under the bills as reported to the House in the last Congress.

The total estimates for the regular appropriation bills for 1913 are $893,661,107.25. The total of the regular annual bills as reported to the House in this session is $829,772,598.57, a reduction, under the estimates, of $63,888,508.68.

The total estimates for the regular annual bills in 1912 were $880,711,581.69, and as reported to the House the bills carried $869,507,292.67, so that in the last session the bills as reported to the House were but $11,204,289.02 under the estimates, as against $63,888,508.68, under the estimates, in this session of the House.

The amount appropriated in the regular annual appropriation bills for the current year is $882,592,679.55, and the amount of the regular annual bills, as reported to the House for 1913, is $829,772,598.57, or a reduction, under the bills for 1912 as finally enacted into law, of $52,820,080.98.

I have already stated that this bill does not by any means measure the extent to which retrenchments and reforms can be introduced. If we had the hearty cooperation of other branches of the legislative and the executive departments we could not only make these retrenchments, but we could initiate many more that would result in a saving of a great many millions of dollars.

Mr. Chairman, during the consideration of the bill ample time will be allowed to consider a great many matters in connection with it. I do not intend to attempt to review the various items in the bill at this time. They range over the entire field of the public service. There are one or two matters which, perhaps, it may be desirable that I should review briefly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Does the gentleman propose——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there is such a rumble of conversation in the Hall of the House that it is impossible to hear what the gentleman from Ohio is saying.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. Gentlemen will cease conversation or retire to the cloakrooms; and if they do not, the Sergeant at Arms will request them to do so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman during his remarks going to touch upon the great reduction that has been made in the appropriation for the Panama Canal, and will he state whether or not that would delay the completion of the canal?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does not mean a deficiency. The appropriations for the Panama Canal for the current year were $45,560,000. The estimates submitted in the regular Book of Estimates for the next ensuing fiscal year are $41,622,810.20.

The amount recommended in this bill is $28,780,000. I suppose the gentleman from Ohio is prompted to ask this question by reason of an absolutely ridiculous editorial contained in a morning newspaper.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; I was not prompted. I observed in the report of the committee the fact, without any explanation whatever, that the appropriations had been reduced nearly $17,000,000, and that was the reason I asked the gentleman the question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I assume that in addition to that the gentleman also read the editorial to which I referred.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; the gentleman was not prompted at all. He has done this of his own motion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I assumed that the gentleman from Ohio had read that editorial.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; I had not read the editorial.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Whether it had any influence on him or not of course I do not know. But, Mr. Chairman, the appropriation is about $13,000,000 under the estimates. The estimates were $41,622,810.20, and the appropriation recommended is $28,780,000. But that is not an unusual reduction. The estimates for $1911 were $48,000,000, and the appropriations were $37,855,000, a reduction of about $11,000,000. My recollection is that between 15 and 20 per cent more work was accomplished with the $37,000,000 than was estimated would have been done with the $48,000,000.

But that is not what actuated the committee in making the reduction. Investigation showed that there would be a surplus at the end of this year which would be carried over into next year of about $5,000,000—somewhat in excess of $5,000,000. When the chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission was last in Washington the committee conferred with him, and he pointed out where the estimates could be reduced because of information he had at that time, which he did not have when the estimates were prepared. The committee has recommended every dollar required to continue the work of the Isthmian Canal during the next fiscal year in accordance with the plans of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

It has recommended appropriations for the full fiscal year for the Isthmian Canal Commission, and has not adopted the policy which has been in force a number of years in the river and harbor appropriations and the public-building improvements of appropriating only until the next sundry civil bill becomes a law, but it has carried the amounts necessary to continue the work until the 30th of June, 1913.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. I assume that the committee desires to appropriate all the money that can be properly expended on the canal. The other day we passed a Panama Canal bill with reference to the operation of the canal. Of course, that bill is not now a law, and the committee could not predicate appropriations upon it. But that bill provided, and probably will provide when it becomes a law, for the construction of docks, warehouses, and such things as that in connection with the supplies for vessels going through the canal. Have these matters been taken care of in this bill as reported, and if not, is it the expectation they will be taken care of after the other bill becomes a law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They were all included in the estimates for the current year, and no reduction on that account was made. If the gentleman from Illinois will examine one provision in the bill which was recommended by the chairman of the commission, the provision regarding the issuance of bonds is so changed as to cover the expenditures for the very purpose that the gentleman indicates.

Mr. MANN. Of course, there is now no authority at law for the construction of these warehouses and docks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a debatable question, whether the docks and certain other matters do not come within the language of the original act. Those in charge of the work believe that without any specific authority those things are so connected and identified with the canal and its operation that the President has the right to have them constructed if he has the money with which to construct them, and provisions have been made with that in view.

Mr. MANN. The bill that the gentleman reports carries a sufficient amount of money to provide this construction?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the intention.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman inform the committee what items have been cut or modified for the purpose of the Panama Canal construction which make up the difference of $13,000,000 between the estimates and the appropriation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should be compelled to take the bill and pick up each item and go through them in that way. It is impossible for me to carry the details, and I believe it will be more desirable to discuss them when they are reached.

I might add this for the information of the committee: That I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations ever since the appropriations for the canal have been made. There has never been any difference of opinion as to how the appropriations should be made. The estimates have always been somewhat radically cut without any conflict among the Members. No item recommended by the Appropriations Committee for the Isthmian Canal has ever been changed either in the House or in the Senate, and there has never been a deficiency, but in most instances a very substantial surplus.

I wish to say to the committee that there has been no change in the policy pursued up to this time in fixing the amounts of this bill for canal purposes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. MANN. A cut of $13,000,000, practically 30 per cent, from the estimate which was submitted last fall in the present bill means inevitably one of two things: Either the lengthening of the time in which to complete the canal or a reduction in the expenditures for the completion of the canal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it is the result of two things—one of the surplus that will be carried over from the present year, of over $5,000,000; the other thing that contributed very largely is that with the progress of the work the efficiency of the force is increasing beyond all expectations.

Mr. MANN. It is a fact, is it not, that, contrary to the usual custom, the cost of the work being carried on there now is less than was anticipated?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; very much less, and not only that, but, as the work has been progressing, the efficiency of the canal force has increased, and the unit of cost of certain kinds of work has been materially decreased.

Mr. MANN. My understanding is that the unit of cost of excavation has actually decreased, although the actual cost of doing the work naturally would have increased as the canal became deeper.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. The difficulty due to the increased depth of the cut and the additional length of the haul would naturally have added to the cost. Instead of that, my recollection is that the cost has been decreased.

Mr. MANN. Has been decreased by increased efficiency.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true.

Mr. MANN. And the canal will be completed sooner than was expected, and probably at a less expense than was anticipated.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe that is correct.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, as I understand it, the gentleman states with absolute confidence that this reduction of appropriation will not delay in any respect the work on the canal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not in any respect. I believe that we are recommending exactly the appropriations that the Canal Commission desire at this time, perhaps with one or two insignificant exceptions. I am speaking now of the bulk of the appropriations. There might be some differences of opinion upon some matters of not very great moment, but as to the total of the $28,780,000 this bill carries for the canal, $13,000,000 below the estimate, $5,000,000 of it is to be made up by the surplus coming over from the present year, and the balance of it is due to the fact that upon a recasting of the estimates it is found that much less money will be required to do the work anticipated than was expected would be necessary when the estimates were prepared last September or August.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, in the operation of the steam shovels through the Culebra Cut, which is 9½ miles through, the number of shovels depends entirely upon the number of levels they can work, and as they work the levels down to the bottom of the canal the number of levels is reduced, and then the number of shovels is necessarily reduced, and so the force is reduced, and when the force is reduced, of course, the quantity of material taken out is reduced, and the consequence is that the expense is reduced. You can not help that. That is all there is to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That undoubtedly is another element, and a very important one.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the whole thing.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. COVINGTON. As a matter of fact, was or was not Col. Goethals, the chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission, before the subcommittee having charge of the sundry civil appropriation bill at the time of the preparation of the items for the Panama Canal?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee visited the Isthmus last November. The inquiry regarding the estimates was had at that time. Col. Goethals was in Washington before the committee, I believe, in April of this year. At that time the committee went over with him the estimates and then practically determined upon the recommendations.

Mr. COVINGTON. Were these estimates made with the practical approval of Col. Goethals?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We fixed these amounts after conference with him. He did not fix them, but we had him state how much money would be necessary under various items, and the amounts fixed are practically, with very few exceptions, what he stated were necessary.

Mr. COVINGTON. Were these items, as finally fixed by the committee, satisfactory to Col. Goethals?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think he has seen them yet, but I have no doubt they are, because the intention of the committee was in good faith to give the money that is necessary to do the work.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The committee reduced the estimates for the Panama Canal construction about 30 per cent. I notice at the same time they reduced the estimate for fortification only about 6 per cent. In view of the desire of the committee to economize, does not the gentleman believe they could very properly have reduced the estimate for fortification somewhat more?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has overlooked something. We had supplemental estimates for fortifications of about three and a half million dollars, which do not appear in the regular estimates.

Mr. MONDELL. I was making my statement from the report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the report also shows that there have been submitted supplemental miscellaneous estimates that are not carried out in the same way as the estimates transmitted in the regular way have been, aggregating $9,984,803.62, in which are included over $3,000,000 additional for the canal fortifications.

Now, if the gentleman will add three and a half millions to the regular estimates of $5,640,950 and then take his percentage he will find it is materially different.

Mr. MONDELL. As a matter of fact, the fortifications are going to cost very much more than they were originally estimated for.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. When we reach those items I may point out the most remarkable thing in connection with the fortifications that has ever been made known in any civilized country having a trained force of technically educated men.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, touching the appropriations for the canal, my impression is—and recollection from a hurried hop, skip, and jump reading of that portion of Col. Goethals's statement which I did not hear—my impression is that this recommendation of the committee is substantially short $6,000,000 for the Panama Canal over his recommendation, after taking into consideration, in round numbers, the $5,000,000 of surplus which appears in this remarkable decrease from the estimates.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois he is entirely in error.

Mr. CANNON. It may be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That might be an inference drawn from reading the hearings, but the gentleman from Illinois may recollect the day in my office when Col. Goethals was there when we went over the estimates without a stenographer. We took his statement and made notes of the amounts required. The gentleman from Illinois suggested perhaps it would be desirable to have it taken by a stenographer. We have the statement of Col. Goethals fixing the estimates in accordance with his views, with the additional information he then had of the amounts necessary.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman may be right, and that can be developed during the five-minute debate. I am still under the impression that the gentleman is about $6,000,000 short of Col. Goethals's recommendation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am absolutely certain that I am not, and I know what I am speaking about. I have participated intimately in the preparation of appropriations for the Panama Canal for at least five years, and I know that this time there has been no change in the policy adopted and followed in that time. The same policy has been pursued in preparing this bill. When it is shown that a surplus of $5,000,000 will exist at the end of the present fiscal year, it is apparent that the appropriations have never been niggardly. I have no doubt from my knowledge of the way the work is done that at the end of the next fiscal year, out of the $28,000,000 appropriated now there will be a surplus of at least $2,000,000. If we had desired, simply for the purpose of making some kind of a showing, we could have justified a reduction of $2,000,000 additional on these estimates. No one on this side desires to make a false showing; we do not propose to take any chances of any delay in completing the canal. It would not be taking much chance to make further reductions, however, because if we did reduce these appropriations further next December, if there were any possibility of a deficit in the next fiscal year, we would have six months within which to provide the needed money. We discussed at one time the propriety of appropriating sufficient money only to carry the canal work up to the 4th of March, but we abandoned that notion and we have recommended here the amount that will be required until the 30th of June next.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. AUSTIN. I see the committee, on page 102 of the bill, carries an appropriation for the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will come to that; I did not intend to take up every item in the bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. This is important to a number of us.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will take up one matter which I think perhaps is of greater universal interest to the Members; however, if the gentleman wants to ask a question I will yield to him.

Mr. AUSTIN. On pages 26 and 27 of the report is a comparative statement of appropriations for 1912, estimates for 1913, and the amounts recommended for 1913. The amount carried under the head of appropriations, 1912, for the Bureau of Mines was $510,500; the amount submitted by the department or bureau for 1913 is $784,800; and the amount carried in the bill is $533,100, an increase of $22,600 over the existing appropriation and $251,700 less than the amount that the bureau has estimated for the coming fiscal year. Will the gentleman kindly tell us why the committee refused to give in this bill the department what it certified it needed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will give the gentleman the reason. There was submitted an estimate for over $200,000 for work not authorized by law, including $50,000 for the construction of a building which is not authorized. I believe the Bureau of Mines and river and harbor work and one or two other insignificant exceptions are the only services in this bill which have received any increase over the appropriations for the current fiscal year. Gentlemen should be quite content in accepting what the committee recommends under the circumstances without expecting recommendations of appropriations for services which the bureau is not authorized to conduct or for buildings which have never been authorized for that bureau. If the gentleman will take the $200,000 out of the $784,800 estimated, he will see the committee has been very liberal with the Bureau of Mines in this bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the committee provide for the expense of conducting our mine-rescue cars in the amount carried in this bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It appropriated the money it thought would be necessary to provide the additional car.

Mr. AUSTIN. Also expenses for operating the car already owned?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; that was the intention of the committee.

Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter which perhaps more Members are especially interested in than any other and that is the items for public buildings. The bill carries appropriations aggregating $8,053,517.92 for public buildings. In the report of the committee the question is gone into quite extensively, and considerable information is furnished for the use of the Members. In the regular Book of Estimates appropriations or amounts for specific projects are stated, but are not carried into the totals, which aggregate $13,109,701.20. The Secretary of the Treasury, however, requested an appropriation of $3,000,000 for next year, and at the same time suggested legislation by which the unexpended balances in all appropriations heretofore made for specific projects be put into one general fund. With an additional $3,000,000 the department would thus be authorized to expend the $13,000,000 upon such buildings and projects as the department thought proper. The statement was made that if that policy were adopted as much could be done in the next fiscal year with an appropriation of $3,000,000 as if $13,000,000 were appropriated. It appears that of the appropriations heretofore made for specific buildings during the next fiscal year there will be at least $10,000,000 that can not be expended. The Secretary believed that if the $10,000,000 were made available for expenditure with the $3,000,000 added, to be expended in his discretion upon such buildings as he determined, it would not be necessary to appropriate more than $3,000,000. The committee did not believe, however, that it would be satisfactory either to the Members of the House or to the country to adopt that method of appropriating for public buildings.

The practice has been for many years—indeed, from the very beginning—to appropriate some specific sum toward the construction of some specific building or the acquisition of a site in some particular place. The money is available immediately upon the bill becoming a law and remains available until expended. Those interested in any particular project are always in a position to tell just how much money is available, just how much may be required additional to what has been provided. The committee did not believe that anyone would be satisfied with any change of policy and made no attempt to change it. In 1910 it was ascertained that, as at present, there was a considerable sum of money appropriated that could not be utilized during the fiscal year, and in an attempt to prevent the unnecessary segregation of funds in the Treasury and the useless tying up of money there the Supervising Architect was requested to revise his estimates so as to show how much money would be required upon every building authorized until the 4th of March next following, when the next sundry civil bill which carries these appropriations must become a law. Such revised estimates were prepared, and the appropriations were made in accordance with them. The committee at this time, in view of the fact that $10,000,000 is unnecessarily tied up, believing it desirable to prevent as much as possible the unnecessary tying up of the money, requested the revision of the estimates until the 4th of next March, and that revision was made and the figures submitted, showing that $8,053,517.92 would be required and was all that could possibly be expended upon public buildings until the 4th of March, 1913, and the committee included in this bill every recommendation made of that character.

Mr. HULL. It is the policy of the committee to insert in the appropriation bill just such amounts of money under these authorizations as may be asked for by the Treasury Department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has been the policy of the committee, and the committee has followed that practice at this time, to give to the Treasury Department for buildings and for sites theretofore authorized all the money it said it could use until the 4th of next March.

Mr. HULL. As I understand the gentleman, it is the policy of the committee and has been the policy of Congress, where authorizations for sites and buildings are once made, to then transfer the entire matter of locating sites, purchasing them, preparing plans and specifications, and determining every phase of building construction and also the proper time or times when a given building or buildings shall be constructed, to the Treasury Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations has not done any of the many things stated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL]. This committee has authority to recommend appropriations in accordance with existing law, and it has done on these public buildings what it has done on recommendations for river and harbor improvements.

When Congress authorizes certain projects, nobody anticipates that they are all going to be completed in one year. It is expected that they will cover a period of years. The War Department submits to Congress estimates of the amount of money it will require during the next fiscal year to carry out the projects authorized by Congress. It states the amount of money it can use, and the committee recommends that sum. It does the same with respect to the Treasury Department on the public buildings.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman quite accurate about that? On river and harbor work the Committee on Appropriations only recommends appropriations where contracts have been authorized. For the public buildings no appropriation is carried in the public buildings' bill, whereas there is in a river and harbor bill. All the money asked for comes from the Committee on Appropriations for the public buildings, but the bulk of the money for the river and harbor improvements comes from the river and harbor bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the statement I have made is substantially correct, for this reason——

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that the gentleman intended it to be correct, but the two classes are not on all fours by any means.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it is substantially correct, for this reason, that the Treasury Department asks for such sums as it will be possible for it to expend on contracts then in force or which it thinks will be in force during the period for which the appropriation is asked. As to letting the contracts and doing the work the Committee on Appropriations has no more control than has any other committee of the House.

Mr. MANN. Now the gentleman is talking about public buildings?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reports a bill for public buildings, which becomes a law. That provides for the authorization. No appropriation is made in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it authorizes contracts, the same as the river and harbor bill.

Mr. MANN. But no contracts are ordinarily let until some appropriation is made for public buildings, or otherwise. That is not the case with rivers and harbors. They have an appropriation to begin with there before they let the contract. The Treasury Department will not let contracts for the construction of buildings until there has been ordinarily some appropriation to start the buildings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a reason, and I think the gentleman will understand it. Before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors authorizes any river and harbor improvement the surveys have all been made and the plans all prepared, and just as soon as the work is authorized the engineers are ready to go ahead with it. But we do not do that with public buildings. We authorize the public buildings first, and then the plans have to be prepared, and an attempt is made to obtain a site and a building for the amount fixed.

Mr. AUSTIN. You make the appropriation before the plans are prepared?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. That is a general appropriation.

Mr. HULL. I am not criticizing the Committee on Appropriations. I am simply trying, Mr. Chairman, to ascertain the real attitude of the Committee on Appropriations with respect to this public-building policy of the Treasury Department. If I understand the method by which this work has been conducted heretofore, it makes no difference how many buildings Congress authorizes or how much money Congress is ready to appropriate with which to construct those buildings. The very moment the authorizations are made the matter becomes entirely divested and taken out of the direction or control of Congress and is transferred to the Treasury Department. The Secretary of the Treasury, exercising his own discretion from his own viewpoint, proceeds to determine how much money he will allow to be expended in the erection of public buildings annually; and by that means Congress, which is held responsible to the people for this work, for these appropriations, thus surrenders control; and Congress may authorize a number of buildings in a bill, but when we go to the Treasury Department and inquire when the work of construction will commence, we are informed there that a particular building or a particular number of buildings will be commenced next year, or two years from now, or three or five years hence, according to the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, Congress in the meantime acting as a bank of deposit, as it were, ready, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] says, to make appropriations if the Secretary of the Treasury asks for the same, and in such amounts as he may ask for.

Now, this condition of affairs, it does seem to me, is altogether unsatisfactory. I heard the gentleman from New York some days ago criticizing some other department of the Government for exercising powers that properly ought to be shared, at least, by Congress, and it does seem to me that here is one subdivision of the executive department, expending during past years more than $200,000,000 in connection with this public-building work, and we have not been able—at least, I have not been able—to fathom the administrative business methods by which sites and buildings, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury exclusively, have been obtained. I do believe that some systematic method as to the administration and as to a definite time when these buildings will be taken up and constructed ought to be pointed out by Congress, in order that Members may know and be able to inform their constituents, to whom the Members are alone responsible for this work, as to when it will be done, and not turn the entire matter over to the Treasury Department.

Now, here is $10,000,000 asked for by this department during past years appropriated and unexpended. Here is the Secretary of the Treasury annually and arbitrarily saying that notwithstanding Congress has authorized a certain number of buildings he will only permit 10 a month to be taken up and dealt with and will not increase his office force enough to construct 12 or 15 or 18, notwithstanding the fact that Congress, which alone is responsible for the projected work, has already acted in so far as it is able to act in the premises.

I simply make this comment in the hope that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] may suggest whether it is or will be the policy of this committee to acquiesce in the present unsatisfactory business methods under which the Supervising Architect's office is conducted. I am opposed to allowing agents under the present system to go out and locate sites for certain Members every time a bill is passed authorizing sites and buildings, or either, and leaving the other Members at the end of the list. Every time this occurs the constituents of a large number of Members are required to wait two or three years longer than the constituents of other gentlemen who are fortunate enough to have their sites located first by these agents, the title approved, and the building plans and specifications prepared. It seems to me we ought at least to be permitted to cast lots as to the order in which this work will be taken up, or, if the Appropriations Committee has no remedy and has not the time to prepare a remedy, I think the Public Buildings Committee, which has ample time, ought to be clothed with the duty of working out a businesslike system for this department in order that if it is not deemed wise to construct all these buildings immediately after they are authorized they may at least be constructed within two years and the country may understand definitely that they will be constructed within that time.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I will.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I should like to know if the gentleman has any facts upon which he bases his suggestion that any species of favoritism has been practiced down there in the department? I know there has been very great and, it seemed to me, very unreasonable delay, but I did not know that there had been in vogue any such practice as the gentleman suggests. I have in mind an appropriation made for a place in my district in 1908, and advertisement was but recently made for the bids for the building.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I am discussing the system and the effects of the operation of the system. I hope I am not trespassing too long on the time of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand the situation the gentleman is complaining about, and I have no objection to his finishing his statement.

Mr. HULL. When a bill is enacted by Congress authorizing sites, for instance, the Treasury Department sends a number of agents out in different directions. I assume that they naturally go in the same directions each time such a bill is passed. They proceed to locate the sites. When their work is approved by the Treasury Department, the question of title comes up. That is turned over to the district attorney's office. That work is then sent to the Department of Justice for its ultimate approval. Finally, when the title is approved and reaches the Treasury Department, it is noted there for further attention and work by the department in the order of time in which it is approved and placed on file.

Naturally, this method may place a large number of the membership here at the end of the list every time a bill for sites and buildings is enacted. Then, following that, the Secretary of the Treasury lops off the entire proposed work except to the extent of $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 or whatever number of million dollars' worth of work his discretion may suggest shall be done annually, and under which prohibition the work on the remaining buildings must wait. Congress under the present policy will not permit even an enlargement of their force, so as to permit a more rapid construction of this work, until it is asked for by the department.

Mr. MANN. Why not?

Mr. HULL. That is one of the evils of which I complain. We sit here apparently with our hands tied; we go to the Supervising Architect's Office and inquire when work will commence on a building. He will inform us that he can not reach it this year or next year or perhaps the year after next. Now, every Member knows that that is not true. It is simply a question of what they want to do.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says it is a question of what they want to do, when it is a question of what they can do with the force that they have in the office.

Mr. GARNER. I want to suggest that in one year, the same fiscal year, they cut the buildings down from 15 a month to 10 a month with the same office force.

Mr. MANN. The office is fully occupied. It is very unfair to the Supervising Architect's Office for Congress to refuse to give it the help it needs and then curse them because they do not do the work they would do if they had the help. It is our own fault.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, who has the floor, the gentleman from Illinois, or who?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. HULL. I understand the gentleman from New York yields to me. With reference to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, it has been the policy of Congress to furnish the Supervising Architect's Office an increase of force when it needed and asked for an increase of force. If the Secretary has asked that the force be diminished, it has been diminished; and if he has asked that it be increased, it has been done. That is the objection which I offer.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I want to occupy some of my own time. I know that many Members of the House are very much embarrassed in regard to public buildings. But we might as well be honest about it. The truth is Congress authorized public buildings and the acquisition of sites far beyond the capacity of the Government to handle them, within any reasonable time, and they did it to delude the people whom they represented, so that the Members might go home and say that they had got a site or a building, when they knew there was no possibility of having a building erected within four or five years from the time it was authorized. We might as well speak frankly about these things, because that is what happened.

Public-building bills were passed in 1902, 1903, 1906, 1908, and 1910. Under those acts 427 sites for buildings were authorized. One hundred and eighty-five buildings were authorized with sites owned by the United States. Four hundred and eighty-two sites with buildings combined were authorized. One hundred and twenty-four additions to existing buildings were provided, and the limit of cost was increased on 359 buildings which had been authorized by some act other than the act which increased the limit. We have now 652 public buildings, an increase of about 65 per cent since the year 1900. We had in the first 125 years of our existence about 250 public buildings. Within the last 12 years we have authorized about double that number, and have actually in commission 652 buildings. There are, in addition, 203 contracts in force, 79 for new buildings and 24 for extensions, and 130 projects for which drawings and specifications are in various stages of completion.

If we had authorized a number of other buildings and sites in this session of Congress, Members of Congress would justly have been indignant in the next few years to come, because, regardless of the amount of money appropriated for the Supervising Architect's Office, there is a limit to the output of that office.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. In the case of all these authorizations, as a matter of fact, the Treasury Department does not let a contract for any of the buildings until Congress makes a specific appropriation for that particular building or buildings, does it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman is mistaken; they make contracts whenever they are ready to make them and Congress appropriates the money.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. My understanding from the department is to that effect, and to that extent Congress at all times has control of the buildings notwithstanding the authorization.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no criticism resting on Congress because of that. Congress has never refused any appropriation for any building authorized that the department said it could possibly use before the next bill became a law.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. How does the gentleman from New York explain the situation that during one fiscal year for which appropriation was made for the Architect's Office, at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury the number of buildings were reduced from 15 a month to 10 contracts a month, and the excuse given to the committee on expenditures in the department was the fact that the Treasury was running low, and they did not think it was necessary to construct more than 10 buildings a month?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman should not ask me that question.

Mr. GARNER. I am replying——

Mr. FITZGERALD. One moment. The Secretary of the Treasury is a member of the executive branch of the Government. If he made a statement that because of the condition of the Treasury he was impelled to act in a certain way in the discharge of his public duties, I am not responsible and can not help it.

Mr. GARNER. No.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the committee over which I happen to preside has no power to make any recommendations to cure any conditions about which there may be complaint.

Mr. GARNER. But the gentleman from New York was undertaking to defend the fewer buildings that had been constructed upon the theory that the architect's office was unable to turn out these buildings. I controverted that by the statement that the Treasurer makes in which he voluntarily reduced the number of buildings to be constructed, because there was not sufficient money in the Treasury to meet the expense. So it is not a fact that the failure of Congress to appropriate or the want of sufficient force in the architect's office to construct these buildings are the reasons they have not been constructed more rapidly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. They made that complaint last summer—that Congress had given insufficient money for the force—and they tried to stampede this Congress into appropriating $200,000 additional for the Supervising Architect's Office at that time. The committee declined to do it, largely because of my stubbornness. A plan was then adopted by which they proceeded to do just a little more work than they would have done if we had given them the $200,000 additional, by the simple device of utilizing a plan for some building that had already been used rather than going to the expense and delay of having a special plan prepared for every building.

They had, I understood, some five or six hundred plans in the office that had been used but once. They could have been used on any number of occasions without any impairment in the efficiency of the service or the artistic features of the scheme. The plans for a building, for instance, in Texas, in a community of a certain size, with a certain space required, might just as well have been used for a building on the Atlantic seaboard in the Southern States, where no additional requirements as to heating would be required.

Mr. GARNER. Or at other points in Texas.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A plan for a building in the upper part of the State of New York could very easily, without any undue comment, have been used in half a dozen other States. But the policy existed whereby every time $50,000, or any other sum, was authorized for a building it was deemed necessary to devote certain technical men to the preparation of plans which differed from every other building of the same character that had been authorized. They have now adopted a new system, and this committee has given in this bill all of the money that has been asked by the Supervising Architect's Office to do the work and all the money that has been asked to enable it to carry on the work already authorized.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will permit, if the hands of Congress are tied and the matter of the construction of a building is to be left entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, regardless of what plan he may suggest, then what remedy has Congress in the matter?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, let me add to what I have already stated that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has already authorized these buildings. That committee has the authority to recommend legislation that will remedy any abuse. I do not imagine that anybody believes that these buildings will be constructed at once. If they were to be constructed at once, it would require some special form of taxation in order to pay for them, and while it is very easy to authorize a number of buildings, it is not so easy to pay for them.

I have had prepared a statement, which has just come from the printer to-day, which contains some very valuable information about public buildings. It shows that every time we add to our investment in public buildings we add to the permanent fixed charges of the Government a sum which, excluding the interest, is very greatly in excess of what we could very readily have the public service performed for in many places without the investment in a building.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I agree with what the gentleman from New York says, that the Congress ought to do one of two things—it ought to either cease authorizing these buildings or it ought to furnish the money to construct them, as the people expect them to be constructed after they are authorized. Since the Committee on Appropriations has been so good this session and has brought in such an amount of wholesome legislation on appropriation bills, it occurred to me that possibly, if the committee should consider this question, as it may do, and it had the time, it might bring in some wise legislation along this line, and that the Committee on Rules would likely make it in order. It occurs to me that if, in the wisdom of the Committee on Appropriations, these buildings ought to be constructed, and that the desire of the people, as expressed through their Representatives, ought to be carried out at an early date, then the Committee on Appropriations owed a duty to the House, in the event that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds refused or failed to perform that duty, to do as it has done in a number of other instances, namely, bring in general legislation on an appropriation bill in order that the country may have relief.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations has failed in no duty to the House and owes none. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] evidently has not kept track of what the Committee on Appropriations has done at this session. It has not recommended any legislation in any bill reported from it the purpose of which was to increase expenditures and increase the burdens upon the people. The legislation which it has reported on appropriation bills has been for the purpose of relieving people from some burdens of taxation. The purpose has been to prevent inefficient administration, to prevent extravagance in the Government service, and to prevent the expending of undue sums, and thereby impose either new taxes or make it impossible to relieve the people from many of the burdens under which they are now groaning. It does not propose either to permit any Member or any number of Members to coerce it in recommending legislation by means of which much money will be more easily poured out of the Treasury. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the gentleman to say that the Committee on Appropriations has been willing and has provided such additional architectural force when it has been asked for by the Treasury Department, or all that they have asked for? Did I understand the gentleman to state that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have recommended in this bill all that has been asked for. I called attention to the fact last summer that the committee refused to give $200,000 that was then said was necessary, because, being familiar with what had happened when the appropriations for the current fiscal year was made, I knew not only it was not necessary, but I was under the impression that what was being done was an attempt to allay a certain agitation which was going on.

Mr. HOUSTON. As I am informed by the department the reason for cutting down recommendations that have been made to the Committee on Appropriations—for instance, in one district, the district which I have the honor to represent—they recommended for the building at Shelbyville $23,000 to carry on the work. Now, they have revised their request and reduced the sum to $1,000, and give as a reason——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is speaking of a different thing entirely.

Mr. HOUSTON. The reason given by them is——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is now speaking of an entirely different matter. He asked me if the committee had recommended all of the appropriations required to enable the Supervising Architect's Office to do its work. I supposed he was speaking about technical and other assistance required. It did. The committee did, in connection with the building of which the gentleman speaks, gives every dollar to carry on construction purposes, to acquire sites, that the department said would be used between now and the 4th day of next March. In the original estimates there was an estimate of $23,000 for the building in which the gentleman is interested, and that estimate contemplated expenditure during the period to June 30, 1913. All of it except $1,000, which is in the revised estimates, is to be expended after the 4th of March. The next sundry civil bill carrying these appropriations becomes a law on the 4th of March, and this committee did not believe it was justified in adding at this time to this bill over $5,000,000 that could not possibly be used before the next bill became a law, simply to carry out the original recommendations.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am informed that the reason they were compelled to revise the estimates that they did submit was the fact that with the limited architectural force at their command that was provided for by appropriations they were not able to carry on the work as rapidly as they desired or expected to do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That statement I do not believe is accurate.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is the reason given.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They got all they asked for. They were given the force they said was enough. If they believed that they should have had more they would have asked for it, and any statement to the contrary that they have not been given the force they believed they needed and should have had can not be substantiated by the facts.

Mr. GARNER. And the gentleman and his committee have given to the Treasury Department all the money that they have requested or suggested that they could use for the construction of public buildings that have been authorized between now and March 4 next?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, we have.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman permit another statement in connection with the statement I made a moment ago? I did not intend to convey the idea I wanted the Appropriations Committee to bring in legislation here that would increase the obligations of the Government, but I did intend to convey the idea that I thought that the Appropriations Committee ought to bring in legislation, if it is necessary, for the purpose of paying the obligations that the Government had already contracted or authorized for in the construction of public buildings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A great deal of the difficulty about public buildings arises from the manner in which the work is carried on. Congress first authorizes a site, or sometimes a site and a building. After the law passes, an agent is sent to select the site. Gentlemen, perhaps, are more familiar with what happens than I am. In most instances a first-class controversy develops in the community as to what particular site shall be selected, and after a very considerable period of time has been wasted in conflict among the people of the community as to whether a site in one place or another, located here or there, shall be selected, and after time is taken to get a site where it will be most satisfactory to everybody concerned, including the convenience of the public service, there may be more time taken in endeavoring to acquire it within the amount of money which is available.

When the site has been finally selected and a contract made, under the law the United States district attorney is required to search the title. There are all sorts of district attorneys employed by the United States; some of them are wide-awake, hustling men, and their offices are up to date, and others are of the type that will not do more business than they are compelled to do, and unless they are prodded and kept after and urged, they keep putting aside these questions of searching titles. After they do get the records in shape and ready to make a certification, I have been informed that frequently they have left the papers lying on their desks rather than to take the trouble to send them to the department, so that they could be sent to the Department of Justice, which, under the law, is required to make a certificate before any property can be acquired. Frequently very long and vexatious delays occur, first because of the very proper differences of opinion that may exist as to where a site should be selected, the difficulties that arise in acquiring it, and these other delays in searching and proving the title, because of the difficulties involved in a complex title, or because of the lack of interest in the public officials charged with that duty. After a site is finally approved and acquired, I am informed that in the Supervising Architect's Office it is given a number next in rotation, and then plans are taken up and prepared for buildings in the order in which these numbers have been given to them. Under the act of 1910 there were 13 buildings advanced out of their turn. I have obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury a list of these buildings and a statement of the reason for their advancement, and in no other instance have buildings been advanced out of their turn.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for a question? It is on a different line. I do not want to interrupt on this question to which the gentleman is referring.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall put in the RECORD that part of the report dealing with public buildings.

Mr. AUSTIN. On page 28 of the report the amount the department asks for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, is $13,234,201.20, and the amount that this bill carries is $8,053,517.92, showing that the bill carries $5,180,683.28 less than the department states it needs for the construction, rent, and so forth, of buildings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have stated several times that following the policy adopted by a Republican Congress in 1910 the committee requested the Supervising Architect to revise his estimates so as to show the amount of money that would be required until the 4th of March next, when the next bill will become a law, and we have given the amount that will be required up to that date.

Mr. AUSTIN. That explains this difference, then?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; that explains the difference.

Mr. AUSTIN. I was out of the Chamber and did not hear it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am sorry that the gentleman did not hear it previously, but I stated it during his absence.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to a question relating to a paragraph in another part of the bill, page 35, line 18, an item as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to refund money covered into the Treasury as internal-revenue collections, under the provisions of the act approved May 27, 1908, $30,000.

I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee if that is the amount usually carried under that item?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the amount.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I want also to ask the chairman if he is not aware that this amount in the current fiscal year has been exhausted in these refunds, and that there is considerable deficit existing?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is an amount that is utterly impossible to estimate accurately, and it is an appropriation in which Congress meets the requirements that are necessary by carrying a deficit in the deficiency bill.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I want to ask if the deficit for the current fiscal year will be met in the deficiency bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes. The gentleman understands in these cases this money must be deposited.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I understand that. Now, I want to ask the chairman a little further, if he does not think that the operations under that act of May 27, 1908, are working a great hardship on many people who are endeavoring to settle claims against them by being pressed by the Government, and if it would not be a more equitable practice to return to the procedure held before the year 1908. Now, the gentleman, if he will give me his attention just a moment, realizes that if a citizen wishes to settle his suit against the Government he must deposit the amount of money which he tenders in settlement, and that money is deposited under the promise that it shall be returned to him if the settlement is not accepted. It has so happened, and I have in mind now two cases, one from my own State, which have been brought to my attention.

One of those cases is the case of a woman who was sued by the Government for the collection of an inheritance tax, and by advice of her attorney, after consultation with the district attorney, she was given to understand that substantially $2,500 would be taken in settlement. This woman raised the $2,500 required by placing a mortgage on her home, on which she is paying 6 per cent interest. She deposited with the proper official of the Government a certified check for the $2,500, but a settlement was refused. She has applied for the payment of her money back, but she is told that there is no fund from which that money can be paid. She paid interest on that money at 6 per cent, not only from the time she gave the mortgage until the certified check was tendered, but also since that time, in February last, when settlement was refused.

Another case brought to my attention, that of a man engaged in the manufacture of moonshine whisky down in Virginia, where, on being sued by the Government, the man was advised by his counsel that substantially $1,200 or $1,500 would be accepted by the Government. He raised the amount by a mortgage, upon which he pays 6 per cent, and deposited that amount with the Government, but a settlement was refused. The Government got a judgment against him for about $1,500, practically for the same amount, and the judgment of the Government carries 7 per cent interest. Now, this man has his check tied up in the hands of the Treasury officials for practically the amount of the judgment that the Government of the United States obtained, and he can not get an offset, and can not get his $1,500 back, because the appropriation out of which that is paid is exhausted. Now, that man is in this position: He is paying virtually 13 per cent interest on the amount of money he owes the Government, whereas if there was a simple business arrangement under the law he would not be required to pay any interest.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would say to the gentleman that the man he refers to would have avoided all that trouble if he had not tried to violate the internal-revenue law by manufacturing whisky without a license.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. It does not matter whether he violated the law or not. He ought to have his money paid back to him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We are not responsible, Mr. Chairman, for this particular condition, and we have no power to remedy it.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I would say that the chairman of this committee has the power to remedy the conditions if he will simply increase the amount that can be utilized for the repayment of these different deposits. And he can also establish a sensible business proposition if he will repeal that law of 1908 and allow these collection officers to take this trust money and hold it as a separate fund as trust money and not turn it into the general fund of the Treasury, where it can not be got at.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is better that the violators of the law should be subjected to some inconvenience than that a number of public officials should be permitted to handle public money without any supervision or control or regulation. We have given in this instance the estimate of the Treasury Department, and I do not know what more we can do. The amount varies one year from another because of differing conditions. In some years much larger sums are required than in others.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Let me say to the gentleman that this money, deposited under these conditions, is not public money until the Government accepts it as a settlement. It is trust money; and there can be no objection whatever to allowing the United States officials to hold that money as trust money, in a separate fund, and not turn it into the Treasury.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There can be objection, because that practice was pursued until, if I recall correctly, the Comptroller of the Treasury held that that money was not private trust funds, but had to be turned into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. These officials are responsible.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At any rate, we have appropriated the amount estimated by the department as necessary, and there is nothing further for us to do.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I wanted to see if the gentleman would be willing to accept an amendment that would repeal that act and prevent these cases arising in the future.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I would not. Mr. Chairman, I think I have covered everything——

Mr. KNOWLAND. We have received a great many letters from California regarding the appropriation for the suppression of the white-slave traffic. I should like to know whether the committee has given the Department of Justice an amount sufficient to carry on that commendable work?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We increased an appropriation available for that purpose by the full amount of the estimate of the department.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The full amount asked for by the department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall insert here part of the committee report on the public buildings and the tables to which I have referred.

"To continue the construction of public buildings heretofore authorized, the bill appropriates, as stated, the sum of $8,053,517.92.

"In the regular estimates for public buildings, transmitted in the Book of Estimates, the Treasury Department proposed a new method of appropriating for such public works. Heretofore there have been appropriated at various times large sums for construction under existing authorizations of public buildings.

"At least $10,000,000 of the sums heretofore appropriated for specific buildings can not be expended upon the particular projects for which the money is available during the ensuing fiscal year. The Secretary of the Treasury set forth in the Book of Estimates, but did not carry into the totals, estimates for projects for which the sum of $13,109,701.20 would be required.

"Instead of asking that this sum be appropriated, he proposed that legislation be enacted which would make one fund of the various specific appropriations heretofore made, and in addition that $3,000,000 be appropriated to be added to such fund, and asserted that with the control of the $13,000,000 thus made available for use in the discretion of the department upon buildings heretofore or hereafter authorized, that equal results could be produced during the next fiscal year as if, in addition to the $10,000,000 heretofore appropriated and unexpended, specific appropriations aggregating $13,109,701.20 be appropriated .

"The committee did not feel warranted in adopting the recommendation of the department. It would have revolutionized the present method of providing for work upon authorized buildings. Under the present system specific appropriations are made for particular projects, and those interested in any building are able to ascertain definitely the money available for use on the particular project. To change that system and to put absolute control over the appropriations in the department, to be allotted in the discretion or according to the caprice or prejudices of some official, would very greatly increase the irritation, discontent, and dissatisfaction which appears to be inevitable even under the present method.

"The committee in its recommendations follows the prevailing custom. The estimates set out in the Book of Estimates, but not carried into the totals, would necessitate appropriations for construction work during the entire ensuing fiscal year aggregating, as already pointed out, $13,109,701.20.

"Appropriations for the construction of public buildings are excepted from the provisions of the "covering in" act. When made, they are available at once and continue available until expended. The custom for many years has been to accept the estimate of the Supervising Architect as to sums required for particular projects and to recommend appropriations strictly in accordance with the estimates.

"In 1910 it was ascertained that, as at present, large sums had been appropriated in excess of the amounts that could actually be expended.

"In an attempt to prevent the unnecessary segregation of funds in the Treasury and the tying up of moneys that could not possibly be used the committee in that year requested that the estimates be revised so as to indicate the various sums required for authorized projects until the 4th of March, 1911, the date of the end of the Sixty-first Congress, at which time the sundry civil appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1912 would become law. Such revised estimates were prepared by the department and submitted to the Congress, and the committee recommended appropriations in accordance therewith.

"The same course has been pursued at this session, and in compliance with the revised estimates the committee recommends appropriations aggregating $8,053,517.92, which amount includes appropriations for every site and building which the Treasury Department states can be expended by the 4th of March, 1913, when the next bill carrying such appropriations will become law.

"This practice is not unusual. It has been applied to appropriations for river and harbor improvements under contract and has been eminently satisfactory. If any other policy were followed it would necessitate the appropriation of $5,056,183.32 additional to the sum recommended in this bill, and would result in increasing the appropriations of money for buildings which must necessarily be idle and unused to $15,056,183.32. To do so would be indefensible from any standpoint, and the committee has declined to follow such a course.

"It may be of value to state some facts relative to public buildings which at times are overlooked.

"Public-building acts were approved June 6, 1902, March 3, 1903, June 30, 1906, May 30, 1908, and June 25, 1910. Under those acts 427 sites for buildings were authorized to be purchased; 185 buildings were authorized on sites then owned by the United States; 482 sites and buildings combined were authorized; 124 additions to existing buildings were provided; and the limit of cost was increased on 359 buildings which had been authorized in some act other than the one in which the limit of cost was increased.

"All of these sites and buildings were authorized in bills considered and reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds or placed in such bills by Senate amendments.

"The Committee on Appropriations has no authority to recommend new sites or buildings, extensions, or increases in the limit of cost of buildings heretofore authorized. It has not attempted to do so in this bill.

"The authority of the committee is limited to recommendations of appropriations to carry out projects authorized by law. It has not attempted to exceed that authority, but has rigidly adhered to the estimates of the Treasury Department, recommending every dollar that can be utilized until March 4 next. Requests have been made for appropriations that the department states can not be used prior to the enactment of the next bill, for authority to exceed the limit of cost, for appropriations for buildings that will not be reached unless advanced out of turn over other buildings. The committe has not been able to justify such action, and has not made such recommendations.

"Under date of March 15, 1912, the Supervising Architect submitted the following statement, which shows the status of the various authorizations for sites and buildings heretofore printed.

"1. There are 203 contracts for buildings now in force, of which 179 are new buildings and 24 extensions. This work is carried out under the direct supervision of 94 superintendents of construction. The drawings for 6 of the buildings have been prepared by private architects.

"2. There are 130 projects for which drawings and specifications are in various stages of completion, but for which contracts have not yet been awarded. Of these, 97 are new buildings and 33 extensions.

"Drawings for 121 of these buildings are being prepared in the office of the Supervising Architect, and for the other 9 by outside architects.

"3. There are 194 projects, all new buildings, for which no drawings have yet been commenced.

"4. There are 172 sites authorized for which no buildings have been provided.

"To complete the buildings heretofore authorized will require $27,750,100. The Supervising Architect's Office is so organized as to perform annually about $13,000,000 of work. In this bill there is carried $831,920, the amount requested by the department to enable the present speed to be maintained.

"There are at present 652 public buildings owned and used by the United States for the transaction of the public business, 128 buildings are under construction, and 106 will be completed during the present year.

"The value of the original construction aggregates $169,675,396; including enlargement of buildings, $185,000,000; including alterations repairs, and maintenance to June 30, 1911, $201,337,229; including sites, which have cost $46,000,000, $247,337,229. For the maintenance and upkeep of these buildings, the sum $5,172,000 is carried in this bill. Every building completed adds to the permanent fixed charges upon the Treasury and can not be ignored nor evaded.

"This committee does not determine the order in which buildings are placed under construction. The Supervising Architect states that buildings are planned in regular order. Whenever a site is acquired it is given a number in the office and the preparation of plans proceeds in the order in which the projects are so numbered.

"The Secretary of the Treasury states that no sites nor buildings authorized under the act of June 25, 1910, have been advanced out of this order, except as hereinafter stated, and the reasons for such advancements are herein given, namely:

"1. Austin, Tex.: The reason for this advancement is that it is located at the State capital. No contract, however, has yet been let.

"2. Bangor, Me.: Advancement is on account of the destruction of the old building by fire. Contract not yet in force.

"3. Dayton, Ohio: This building was advanced on account of the urgent necessity for increased accommodations for Government offices, there being no court quarters in the old building. This building is under construction.

"4. Gettysburg, Pa.: Advanced in order to be ready for the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Battle of Gettysburg. Building is under construction.

"5. Hanover, Pa.: Same reason as No. 4. Contract has not yet been let.

"6. Executive mansion, Juneau, Alaska: Advanced because of the short building season and the urgent necessity for building. Construction just started.

"7. Lorain, Ohio: Advanced on account of the urgent necessity for increased accommodations for Government offices and inability to rent adequate quarters. Building not yet under contract.

"8. Olympia, Wash.: Advanced on account of being located at the State capital and the necessity for increased accommodations for Government offices. Contract just let.

"9. Oneonta, N. Y.: Advanced in order to make up for the extraordinary delay in acquisition of title for the site. Building not yet under contract.

"The following buildings—

"10. Orange, N. J.;

"11. Booneville, Mo.;

"12. New Haven, Conn.;

"13. San Francisco, Cal., subtreasury—have been placed in the hands of private architects and for this reason have been taken out of the regular order.

"The committee has treated at some length the matters affecting the appropriations for public buildings, because of the widespread interest in the subject, and in order to have accessible in one document and in somewhat concise shape the information herein contained. It is believed that the statement will be of service to the House and tend to a better understanding of the situation relative to public buildings in the many communities interested in the subject."

STATEMENT OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS AUTHORIZED UNDER THE ACTS OF 1902, 1903, 1906, 1908, AND 1910, SHOWING THE LIMITS OF COST, POPULATION, POSTAL REVENUES, ANNUAL COST OF MAINTENANCE, AND ANNUAL RENTAL AND OTHER EXPENSES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 31, 1912.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Referring to your letters of January 20 and 27, 1912, and in response to the requests contained therein, the department has the honor to forward herewith certain detailed information relative to each new public building authorized in the separate building acts of June 6, 1902, March 3, 1903, June 30, 1906, May 30, 1908, and June 25, 1910. The details called for are embraced in five separate statements, accompanied with a separate sheet covering a recapitulation in the aggregate for all the acts referred to. In compliance with your request, the data furnished have been supplied in detail only as to each new building, eliminating additions or extensions to buildings.

The information desired by you in connection with the postal revenues, the population of cities and towns, the annual rental and expenses of quarters at the times the buildings were authorized, and other probable expenses of operation and upkeep, has been procured from the various executive departments and independent offices charged with the control of such matters, and the figures supplied have been incorporated in appropriate columns for each of the acts named.

All remaining features of information, other than those just referred to, embracing limits of cost, occupancy of buildings, probable annual cost of maintenance, including personal services, fuel, light, water, repair, and other expenses of operation and upkeep, have been compiled from the records of this department, and, with the exception of the last-named item (maintenance), the figures and details given are absolute.

The annual cost of maintenance of public buildings under the control of this department, as given in the statements, is believed to be a fairly close approximation of the actual expense incurred, and is in consonance with your inquiry asking for "probable cost." The figures given in the statements, under this head, were based upon averages ascertained by a division of buildings into 16 different classes and determining the pro rata measure of expense, including all the items referred to in your inquiry, for a period of five years. The result has been a very close approach to the true conditions. An exhaustive research and analysis, involving a considerable period of time, would, of course, be necessary if this particular class of detail was worked out to a result based upon actual figures. These latter could only be acquired by considering the cubic area of each building in its relation to the respective occupants and the space occupied by them, together with a due consideration of other questions more or less affecting the conditions incident to the occupancy and use of the rooms in the respective buildings.

With reference to the last paragraph of your letter of January 20, 1912, in which you ask to be advised as to the approximate percentage of annual depreciation in value of public buildings, having due regard for the purposes for which such buildings are used and the ravages of time, the department desires to state that, in its opinion, giving due weight to the conditions incident to the care and upkeep of public buildings, as compared with others of like character, the approximate rate of depreciation could be fairly expressed as about 2 per cent annually. An element, however, in this connection, which it seems is deserving of consideration, is the constantly increasing value, from an investment standpoint, of the majority of public building properties under the control of the department.

In the event that your committee should decide to have the accompanying statements printed as a public document, this department would be pleased to receive about a dozen copies thereof for its files and for future reference.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN MACVEAGH,
Secretary.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS UNDER THE CONTROL OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to consume some of his time. Has the gentleman anyone who wishes to occupy time now?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. Does the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield the floor.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will take but little time in talking about this bill, and I am not going to take any time unless I can have order. I have listened, as well as I could, in the confusion to the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], which is a very interesting statement. I take pleasure in that the committee of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is chairman has made vigorous investigation touching this great bill, carrying $109,000,000 in round numbers. The bill covers a great many branches of the public service. In the main, I indorse the provisions of this bill. The bill sins, but it sins, in my judgment, more in omission than in commission.

The estimates for this bill—original and supplemental—are, in round numbers, $151,000,000, and the amount favorably reported is $109,000,000. Seemingly, the estimates are extravagant or the amount recommended is too small.

Now, I want to state very briefly that this large reduction is, in point of fact, more apparent than real; and if the bill should be enacted into law in its present form, then next winter by a deficiency bill or by appropriations for the ensuing fiscal year these estimates will have to be agreed to substantially by appropriations to be made next year, and in the meantime the public service will suffer. But it being the duty of the Executive under law to estimate for the whole of the coming fiscal year, a large part of this reduction arises from the fact that the appropriation is for 9 months of the coming fiscal year instead of 12 months. The estimate is for 12 months, the appropriation is for 9 months.

I want to be perfectly just and to say that for a year or two as to rivers and harbors and as to public buildings the appropriation has been for 9 months rather than for 12 months.

For instance, the estimate for the public buildings and grounds, as explained by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], was revised, not in a public document, but in a hearing before the committee, so as to give the amount that can be expended for these public buildings by the 4th of March next, and a reduction from the published estimates is recommended in the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. CANNON. I will yield in a moment. I want to get the amount of this reduction. The amount of the estimates was $13,234,201.30. The amount recommended is $8,053,000 in round numbers.

Mr. MONDELL. Then does it not follow that the apparent saving will have to be made up in the next appropriation bill and that it is just deferring payment?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Wyoming has restated the fact more tersely than I was able to state not three minutes ago.

Mr. MONDELL. What object can there be in that program except to make a showing of economy when, as a matter of fact, there is no economy?

Mr. CANNON. That has been fully explained, and in justice to the gentleman from New York I will say that he is following a precedent that has been followed in former Congresses. Now, as to rivers and harbors and public buildings, the appropriation is a continuing one and does not lapse. In rivers and harbors the reduction is made from the estimates of $2,743,000. That is all that can be expended, as we are informed, until the 4th of March.

Now, when you come to the Panama Canal, the estimates are reduced by nearly $13,000,000. I can not agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. As I recollect the statement of Col. Goethals, he said that considering the amount that had been appropriated by former Congresses—as this appropriation does not lapse and will be available after the 1st of July, as it is available now—he could meet the coming fiscal year for one-half of that $13,000,000, substantially. I believe there is a surplus of about $5,000,000, and the estimates are reduced about $13,000,000. Now, I thought the statement of Col. Goethals was not given due weight, and the whole decrease of $13,000,000 was made below his recommendation.

Again, and this is a very important matter, because I will agree that if this appropriation falls short for the completion of the Panama Canal, Congress will meet in December, and by a deficiency can increase the appropriation. But now I want to call attention to the estimates for the fortifications of the Panama Canal. The bill carries $2,806,000, and the aggregate estimates were cut $6,421,500. I do not believe that this cut is wise. In the first place, the canal approaches completion. We have skilled labor now on the Isthmus more than we will ever have again, and I believe these fortifications substantially ought to be completed when the canal is opened so far as it is possible to complete them. When the canal is finished we shall lose a large part of that labor, and if fortifications, barracks, and so forth, are necessary at all they ought to be completed promptly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HEFLIN). Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Can the gentleman from Illinois indicate any item in regard to the fortification of the Panama Canal where he thinks a larger sum ought to be appropriated?

Mr. CANNON. I think every——

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman name some specific item?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Kentucky will understand that we will soon come to the five-minute rule, where amendments will be in order and where item by item will be considered, and these matters can be taken up. In the short statement that I propose to make—and I trust that it will not exceed 25 or 30 minutes—I can only call attention to general items. I will comply with the gentleman's request later on.

Mr. SHERLEY. The reason for my inquiry is this: So far as the majority of the committee is aware, there has been not a single dollar denied for fortification purposes that can be used during the time that this bill is to cover, and I would like the gentleman to show where there is such an item. He is making a broad and sweeping statement.

Mr. CANNON. I call attention to the estimate and the supplemental estimate. Fortification in some respects is a slow work. There have to be forgings and guns and emplacements, and with these appropriations available the work can proceed and proceed rapidly. Now, I do not care at this time to take up, item by item, these appropriations. I did not rise for that purpose, but I will take them up with the gentleman when these items are reached under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask if there was any estimate made by any department for that portion of the fiscal year beyond the 4th of March?

Mr. CANNON. I am not aware that there was an estimate for that period. It was for the whole 12 months.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose these items that were put in the bill were simply taking three-fourths of the estimate, or what was it for?

Mr. CANNON. I do not think the gentleman purports to appropriate for the nine months for the Panama Canal, but rather for the whole fiscal year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; we appropriated for the full year.

Mr. CANNON. That answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. PAYNE. Can the gentleman mention a dollar of these estimates that are not appropriated for which will not have to be appropriated for in the future, for the completion either of the buildings or the canal?

Mr. CANNON. I apprehend that all of them will have to be appropriated for and paid for, but my criticism touching fortifications is that we are better prepared now to proceed vigorously with that work during the coming fiscal year than we will be hereafter.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, one at a time.

Mr. PAYNE. One other question, if the gentleman will wait.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will wait on the gentleman from Illinois, but not on the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Kentucky may possibly wait on both of them.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] most kindly for withdrawing and allowing me to ask a question. I have almost forgotten what the question was that I had in mind. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois has answered the question. I wanted to ask if there was any possible reason for dividing the fiscal year into two parts, one three-fourths of it and the other a quarter of it, except that there is an election intervening between now and December.

Mr. CANNON. I will say that probably that was the origin of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. The Republican origin.

Mr. CANNON. And I will be equally frank and just in saying that as to public buildings and as to rivers and harbors the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the majority of the committee have followed an example that was set in former Congresses.

Mr. SHERLEY. And as to fortifications also.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not mean to say that that was the origin of it, but I think I can explain the matter.

Mr. PAYNE. I have not heard it explained, and I wondered what reason there could be for it.

Mr. CANNON. I would prefer to make this speech myself, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not trying to make the gentleman's speech, but I think in justice to the committee he should permit a statement to be made that will tell the facts regarding these things and not have the committee, either through himself or others, put in an unfair position. The gentleman has all of the time that he wants.

Mr. CANNON. Very well, I will yield to the gentleman to make a statement, very briefly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, fortification appropriations have been made since I have been on the Committee on Appropriations from the time the bill carrying them would become a law until the next bill would become a law, because appropriations are made immediately available and continue available until expended. It was found in making river and harbor appropriations and public building appropriations that the adoption of that system would prevent the unnecessary segregation of funds that could not be used. It seemed to be a good policy. It was not criticized when it was adopted by the Republicans, by the Members on our side of the House, and the committee this year adopted the same policy, because the appropriations are not made for fiscal years. As to fortifications, I simply wish to say this: One supplementary estimate for barracks and quarters aggregating three and a half million was submitted which was not allowed, but on every other item for fortifications in this bill that sum is recommended in the bill which the department says can be utilized in accordance with the policy in vogue in making appropriations for fortifications since I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, having progressed, I will state again that these items under the head fortifications were cut to the extent of $6,421,500. In my judgment, the cut is not warranted.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit just one suggestion——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well——

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly, if the gentleman does not want to yield I will not interrupt him.

Mr. CANNON. I do not care to go into the matter item by item, but I want, briefly, if I can, to state my position, calling the attention of Members of the House to what I believe to be the fact, but I can not wander through 3,000 pages of hearings and discuss the matter item by item now.

I shall have accomplished my object if I call the attention of the committee to what I believe is justly entitled to be criticized, and then we can all go to work for and against. Now, these sums I have mentioned account for $21,188,331.48 of the decreased amount carried by this bill under the estimates and under the amount carried by the bill last year. Now, then, I might go through and call attention item by item, but it would take me five or six hours to do it. I only hit that which seems to me ought to be hit by calling attention to particular matters. I think this want of appropriation is subject to just criticism. Mr. Chairman, now, another subject. For the enforcement of the antitrust laws the estimate was $250,000,000——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The estimate was $250,000.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is correct, but I think all of the House understood what I meant to say. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and myself will get along under the five-minute rule. I expect he will knock me down, but if he bruises my head maybe I will bruise his heel. Now, this item was cut $50,000. They only gave them $200,000, and the amount recommended is $50,000 less than the bill carried for the last year. Great heavens! It is my recollection when the present majority was in the minority, when passion was torn to tatters and the minority insisted upon great appropriations for the enforcement of the antitrust laws—which you did not enforce when you were in power under Cleveland—great sums in the way of estimates would come in and you would double them in your anxiety to have the laws enforced; and, now that they are being enforced, you cut the appropriations in the face of these recommendations. I believe, under the five-minute rule, that the House will increase the appropriations as asked for by the Executive. Well, now, for armories and arsenals you make a pretty severe cut. The estimates for the manufacture of arms and for the equipment of arsenals—especially the Rock Island Arsenal—the regular estimate was $170,000, and a special estimate of $250,000 was submitted and not given.

Now, here is a very grievous omission in my judgment and I want gentlemen to give me their attention. For the personal services required in the care and maintenance of the public buildings throughout the country the appropriations are cut $50,000 below the estimates for the next year and below the amount carried for the present year, yet, these appropriations being made 12 months ago or about 12 months ago, there have been in round numbers 100 public buildings added to what were then in existence and there are 107 public buildings to be completed and 14 where extensions are to be made during the coming fiscal year. Yet when you come to the janitors and custodians, notwithstanding that fact, this appropriation is cut below that for the current year and the estimates for this year by $50,000. But that is not all. For fuel, light, water, and other necessary supplies for public buildings there is a cut to which I call attention, that I fancy will receive the attention under the five-minute rule, looking in the eye of the very vigilant gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] who is always interested about public buildings, as I fancy he ought to be, coming from that great State that grows so rapidly, 1,200 miles from the eastern boundary of Texas to El Paso, which is substantially on the eastern boundary, so I am not criticizing him, but I am assuming that will be so because I know he will take care of it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield at that point? Is this another one of those nine months' appropriations about which we have heard so much?

Mr. CANNON. No; it is a twelve months' baby, or ought to be.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it is rather small under the circumstances, I judge from what the gentleman from Illinois said.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; it is not as large as a nine months' child ought to be. [Applause.] Oh, you may say they can cut the wages of these people, but they are very poorly paid; and, bless my soul, I know that my other colleague, Representative FOWLER, that if he will just see how low those wages are of custodians and janitors he will come to their rescue. Now, you will find there is a great cut in the appropriation for furniture below the estimates, notwithstanding the 107 public buildings that are coming in during this fiscal year, which I have no doubt will receive attention. Now, we have the enforcement of the commerce act—a reduction of $15,000 under the Department of Justice. For expenses of collecting revenues from customs, the estimate is reduced from $5,000,000, which was the sum granted in the current year, to $4,650,000, and yet there is an estimate of $400,000 of deficiency for the current year. Now, I want to say we ought not to propose by legislation to repeal the permanent appropriation for the collection of customs; that is, $5,000,000——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Five and a half million until there is legislation that will care for this service. This bill proposes legislation that will, if enacted, result in materially affecting the machinery for the collection of customs revenues.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. But I want to say that coming events cast their shadows before, and, everything considered, I do not know that I desire to severely criticize the majority of the committee touching this matter.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to intimate or say that the proposed legislation with reference to the change from permanent appropriation will enable the Treasury Department to abolish customhouses and customs districts?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will abolish absolutely useless customs officials who ought to have been abandoned 20 years ago.

Mr. GARNER. Let me get the exact fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the exact fact.

Mr. GARNER. Then, it will enable the Treasury Department to exercise its judgment as to what it ought to continue and what ought to be abolished? In other words, you are taking away from Congress the right to say what districts ought to be established and ought to be abolished, and turning it over to the Executive?

Mr. CANNON. I would rather not yield further.

Mr. GARNER. I thought the committee ought to know——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The testimony before the Committee on Appropriations is to the effect that as much as $1,500,000 could be saved if this were done, and I am willing to trust the executive department to carry out the law.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from New York will remember that we were defeated on the floor of the House concerning the same thing?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We hope that this Democratic Congress has more sense than the Republican House that defeated it.

Mr. CANNON. I will not say that there is not something in the proposition. I merely call attention to the fact that after all, until after the baby is born, possibly, it is not well to inquire what its name shall be, and so forth. In other words, if the legislation is had, the money would not be spent if we appropriate what we have been in the habit of appropriating heretofore. I think it is quite problematical whether the legislation will ever be enacted, and yet I think there might be legislation enacted that would improve the present condition.

Now, we come to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Without going into the matter I would just call attention to the fact that this is a bureau that prints the bonds and the notes and postage stamps, and it is a great bureau. I do not know how many, but I suppose it employs 900 to 1,000 people—skilled mechanics. The estimates for this bureau have been cut $701,186. I think that would bear looking into.

I think there is some legislation to be proposed, but whether it will ever be enacted or not I do not know; but it is the duty of this House, whether the Members be from the North, the South, the East, or the West, Republican or Democrat, to know that we can not afford to have the efficiency of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing impaired. I have called attention to it, and shall not go into what I believe is some legislation that is to be recommended and carried in the bill. Of course, somebody may make a point of order, and I do not know whether my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is on the Committee on Rules or not.

Mr. GARNER. He is not.

Mr. CANNON. Well, he ought to be.

Here is a matter that I do criticize. For many, many years there has been a great interest in suppressing epidemic diseases that invade this country from time to time. As somebody said, they are "Bedouins of the air." I do not know that they are Bedouins of the air. They seem to come from germs. Take the yellow fever, take the smallpox, take the bubonic plague, and they do not travel much by air. They travel by water. They are disseminated by animal life coming into contact with the germs—the germs carried by the ground squirrel and carried by the mosquito, and so on. We have a great service in the United States—I fancy the most efficient quarantine service and the most efficient service for keeping out these contagious diseases of any country on earth.

I may be mistaken about that, but seeing what has been accomplished, I am inclined to think this service is efficient. We watched it pretty closely when it quarantined the cholera in New York, and when from time to time the yellow fever was halted. Now, so anxious were we when the plague and the yellow fever got in its work and people died in great numbers that we then woke up and made an appropriation, a continuing appropriation, to be at the disposal of the Marine-Hospital Service to protect the public health by prevention. That appropriation was for $750,000. It was made some years ago. There is about $100,000 of it left now. The supplemental estimate called for $500,000 more. Now the committee recommends $100,000. Well, I will vote for the $500,000. The $750,000 has not been expended through many years. How many?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Three or four years.

Mr. CANNON. It will not be expended unless it is necessary to expend it.

"But," you say, "Congress meets in December, and"——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman will recollect the fact that we have taken off the epidemic fund over $125,000 worth of employees, and specifically appropriated for them under the Bureau of Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I am going to vote for this $500,000, and I would just as soon make it $800,000 or a million dollars. We can control ordinary expenditures by curtailing appropriations, and can postpone needed service without serious danger to life or health, but the cholera and the yellow fever and the bubonic plague have not any more respect for legislation or for the time when Congress meets, in timing their invasion, than a duck has for a June bug. [Laughter.] An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

Now, the committee cuts the appropriation for printing—a pretty severe cut. I think the estimate ought to be given.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think it ought to be given?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where there has been a surplus in one department of $73,000 that they could not use, does the gentleman think that we ought to appropriate that money? I ask the gentleman that question.

Mr. CANNON. Do you make that $73,000 available?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. CANNON. It goes into the Treasury?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I believe that under the present Public Printer there has been no deficiency. Am I right?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Practically. There have been deficiencies, but they are not to be criticized. I have in mind one department of the Government where there is a very substantial reduction in the appropriation for public printing—a department which in 1911 could not spend $73,000 of the money given to it—and that is one of the ways in which we made these reductions. We took away the money they could not spend.

Mr. MANN. Did not spend. The gentleman means did not, not could not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They could not.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman appropriate anything particularly for that department?

These estimates for public printing are reduced by $659,000 plus, half a million more than that, and they are below the appropriations for the current year—that is, this year—$430,000. As compared with the amount given this service for the next year it is a reduction of more than 10 per cent in the estimate, and more than 8 per cent in the current appropriation. I will say again that I am under the impression that this service in the Government Printing Office is being economically and well conducted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does not affect the appropriations for public printing. This affects the activities of these departments in printing a lot of useless stuff, using the appropriations made by Congress to send out printed briefs and arguments against the activities of Congressmen in attempting to reform the departments. We want to stop it.

Mr. CANNON. I was quite aware that for many years past we have sought to do the printing for the Government in the Government Printing Office, and I have also been quite aware that appropriations for printing in the various departments were expended substantially in the Government Printing Office, although some of them have little jerk-water printing establishments of their own, which I am inclined to think in the main ought to be abolished.

Mr. GARNER. In other words——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; let me finish this just now. So that from ancient recollection I have some slight knowledge of the skeleton of the public service as connected with the printing for Congress, and also for the departments. But I say again that, in my judgment, this great reduction—nearly half a million dollars below what the bill for this year carries and $600,000 below the estimates—is not warranted. Perhaps I am wrong. I call attention, however, to the fact.

Now, there is another sin of omission that I want to notice. The National Museum is now in a great new building, just completed, occupied substantially in the last 12 or 18 months, and not fully occupied yet, not fully furnished. I do not know how much it cost, but I suppose about $4,000,000. The estimates for that are cut $132,000. In my judgment the estimates should have been given substantially, and will have to be given if that service is fairly maintained.

In the Interior Department I think the committee, in its desire to reduce expenses, has failed to recommend appropriations that ought to be given. If gentlemen will turn to page 25 of the report, they will see that in the Pension Office there is an estimate for renewing and repairing plumbing, $20,000; carpenter shop, $3,000; repairs, $18,000; painting, $10,000; and new roof, $25,000. My information is that that roof does not shut out the water. Electric-lighting plant, $3,500. Steel cases in the Land Office, $25,000. For the Patent Office, improvements and repairs, $220,000, which I think perhaps are needed more than any other. Steel bookstacks, $2,500, an item which is given in the bill. And that is the only thing that is given. Special repairs, $50,000; fire protection, $21,000. My judgment is that those appropriations ought to be made substantially, and if this was private property would be made, from the standpoint of utility.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows that the chief clerk of the Interior Department submitted very large estimates for repairs for certain public buildings under that department, including the Interior Department Building, the Patent Office, the old Post Office, and the Pension Office. They aggregated a great many hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not recall whether the gentleman from Illinois was present at the time; but if he were, he will remember that the committee determined, in view of the very extraordinary character of those repairs, that instead of taking up those matters at this time they would hold them in abeyance, and during the recess would have Mr. Woods, the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, make an examination with his experts, so that the committee would have some information of an independent character upon which it could justify recommendations for these extraordinary repairs that are now asked in that connection. The Secretary of the Interior, in a supplemental estimate, asked $191,000 in order to put sufficient furniture into the offices under his control, upon the theory that the appropriations during the last few years for furniture in the offices of the Interior Department have been so grossly inadequate that they now require $191,000 worth of desks and cases, and different kinds of tables and chairs, to permit the department to do its business properly; and that casts such a suspicion upon all of those estimates that the committee thought it ought to have the aid of an impartial and competent examination before it could undertake to make recommendations.

Mr. CANNON. We all know where the Interior Department Building is, and just across the street is another building of about equal size. Then we all know about the Geological Survey, and we all know about the Bureau of Mines, and we all know about the Bureau of Pensions. I guess if gentlemen will examine they will find quite a lot of other people under the Interior Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Bureau of Mines is in a rented building.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. It is in a rented building, but, after all, appropriations for furniture have to be made, even for rented buildings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have been made from time to time for that service.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. I call attention to it. I am reliably informed that both in the Pension Office and in the Patent Office the roofs are bad, that repairs are badly needed. If a bargain could be made with the Weather Bureau which would insure that it would not rain or snow until we could meet next year to make appropriations, then we could perhaps wait on investigations to be made by the Superintendent of the Capitol. Bye the bye——

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will pardon me, does not the gentleman think it would be unkind in us to assume that Congress, one branch of which had been organized by the gentleman himself, had been so derelict during eight years that he was Speaker as to permit the public buildings to get into such dilapidation that we could not wait long enough to have an expert investigation made to find out whether these extraordinary sums were necessary?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am always gratified to have my broken remarks adorned by the suggestions of the gentleman from New York; they are useful for adornment and sometimes useful otherwise. Does the gentleman know that the maintenance of buildings, the maintenance and repairs of everything cost at least 5 per cent and sometimes more a year? If you start it new it would cost 5 per cent, and that applies to the furnishings as well. I guess 10 per cent, probably, would be a reasonable amount to keep everything in shipshape, and certainly 5 per cent would hardly do it. Unless you can shut off the forces of nature to prevent decay, this work of repair has to be done year by year, and gentlemen ought not to forget that "a stitch in time saves nine."

Now, I think under the five-minute rule we will find that the appropriations for the Ellis Island immigration station, amounting to many hundred thousands of dollars, ought to be made in whole or in part not only for the protection of the immigrant but of our citizens as well. I call attention to it that gentlemen may investigate it in the meantime.

There are many other items that I might refer to, but one matter of omission is the dropping out of the item for the Tariff Board. The gentlemen in the majority see proper to do it, and I want to be fair and just to myself as well as others. I have believed, and still believe, that when the Constitution conferred upon the House the power to originate revenue bills, that duty rests upon the House. Sometimes we do not originate them with very great intelligence, as we on his side claim when you originate, and you in turn claim when we originate; but, after all, there is the power and there is the responsibility. When this question of the board of experts was first brought up some years ago, it did not strike me with very great favor.

I am frank to say that, but I want to say that "the proof of the pudding is in the eating thereof," and that this so-called Tariff Board that is constituted under the law by a provision in the so-called Payne tariff bill was properly constituted. I am acquainted with the membership of a part of that board. It is called a nonpartisan board, and I believe that it is nonpartisan. I am quite well acquainted with the gentleman from Georgia, who was formerly our colleague, a Democrat, and I believe there is also another Democrat on the board. The chairman I am slightly acquainted with. I want to say that in view of the investigations that board has made and the reports it has made, without being an expert myself, but after consultation with those who are experts, some in the House and some not in the House, I believe there never has been an equal amount of money so well expended for reliable information touching cost of production in the United States and cost abroad, industriously gathered and intelligently gathered and reported, as we have had gathered and reported by that board. I believe it should be continued. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, this bill fails to make any appropriation for the continuance of the Tariff Board. If enacted into law in its present form, it will effectually put an end to the work of the board until after the 4th of next March, when, at a special session of a Republican Congress, called by a Republican President, a real tariff commission will be created to continue the work of the present Tariff Board, so well begun. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have some hope, however—faint, it is true, but yet some hope—that this Congress will insert in the bill an appropriation for continuing the present Tariff Board. That this will be done to assist the Republicans in securing information from which to apply protective tariff rates, so called, I do not expect, but I do insist that this information is just as necessary from the Democratic standpoint of a tariff for revenue only as it is from the Republican standpoint of a protective tariff.

I have endeavored to convince our Democratic friends of this upon a number of occasions in the past, and I would not undertake to repeat the attempt now were it not for the fact that I am now in a position to offer conclusive proof of the correctness of my position.

Before entering upon that discussion it will not be out of place to review very briefly the history of the efforts to create a tariff commission.

The status of the present Tariff Board is familiar to every Member of the House. It is not clothed with the powers or responsibilities that a Tariff Board should have. It is entirely a creature of the President and solely responsible to him. The publicity of its findings depends wholly upon the President; and yet, imperfect as it is, the service it has rendered has been of incalculable value to the public.

I have said that the present board is not perfect in that it is not a permanent body and is not clothed with sufficient powers. In the Sixty-first Congress the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] and I introduced bills creating a permanent tariff commission. We appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means in favor of these bills, and out of these two bills a bill was finally formulated and its passage recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means. Nearly all of the Democratic members of the committee joined with the Republicans in support of the bill. Among the Democratic members supporting it was the present Speaker of the House [Mr. CLARK] and the leader of the majority [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. The bill passed the House by a vote of 186 to 93. On the 4th of March, 1911, in the early morning, the Senate concurred in the bill with minor amendments. A rule was adopted by the House which insured its final passage before 12 o'clock, the hour of final adjournment. A filibuster was conducted under the leadership of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], but that filibuster was ineffectual to prevent the passage of the bill, and it would have been a law to-day had there not been a violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. While the gentleman is reciting the history of that, will he show who was responsible for that violation of the rules of the House—the stopping of the roll call—who it was that made it absolutely possible for the filibuster that defeated the bill to succeed?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, the gentleman from Kentucky knows as well as I do who was responsible for that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know; and I know that it was the then Speaker of the House and some of the leaders upon that side.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman ought not to make that statement.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do make it, and make it upon my responsibility as a Member, in order that the record may be complete.

Mr. MANN. I deny it upon my responsibility and knowledge.

Mr. SHERLEY. The facts will show. I was here and fighting for the Tariff Board when some of the recent converts were fighting against it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further, for the reason that I have only reviewed the history for the purpose of showing what the attitude of the then Democratic minority was, and the position of the now Speaker of the House of Representatives [Mr. CLARK] and the leader of the majority [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

I repeat this history for the reason that the present Speaker of this House [Mr. CLARK] and the leader of the majority [Mr. UNDERWOOD] can not escape responsibility now for failing to appropriate for a Tariff Board when a little more than a year ago they favored a commission with much broader powers than the present board has.

I believe the Republican side is unanimous for the continuance of the present board. Its only opponents, so far as I know, are the Democrats and the great manufacturing trusts and combinations of the country. The Economist, the organ of the high-tariff advocates, is entirely in accord with our Democratic friends. Neither wants Congress to have information upon costs of production at home and abroad. It is easy to see why those enjoying excessive tariff benefits do not want Congress to have this information, but the professions of the Democrats that they favor a tariff for revenue only and yet oppose the Tariff Board are absolutely irreconcilable.

In the debate in the Sixty-first Congress upon the bill creating a Tariff Commission I used the following language:

> When our friends in the next Congress attempt to prepare their tariff-for-revenue bill, the first inquiry will be within what limits they may place rates upon a tariff-for-revenue basis. They may commence at the bottom with the free list and impose rates upon different articles competing with products in our own country upon an ascending scale up to a certain point. And what is that point? It is the point just above the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, and when they get any rate substantially above that point they have not a tariff for revenue only, they have not even a protective tariff, but a prohibitive tariff that is condemned by Republicans and Democrats alike. And so I say you can not frame a bill upon the basis of a tariff for revenue only without knowing the difference in cost of production at home and abroad.

At the special session last summer the House passed a bill revising the cotton schedule. The Democratic majority proposes to pass it again at this session. The bill, as we all know, was prepared by the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee. In their report upon that bill they used the following language:

> The most important feature to be kept in mind in revising Schedule I in the interest of the welfare of the general public is that the rates be made truly competitive as far as possible; that is, that they be made low enough to permit potential competition from imports for the sake of natural and proper regulation of domestic prices.

Now, that is exactly the Republican doctrine, and the fact is that the difference between a maximum tariff for revenue only and a proper protective tariff is absolutely nothing except the name.

I shall now undertake to show that the Democratic tariff revision of the cotton schedule, passed at the special session last summer, was not based upon a tariff-for-revenue theory at all, but was a high-protection bill, and we know now that many of the rates in it, so far as possible importations are concerned, were practically as prohibitive as the rates in the Payne-Aldrich law. I supported that bill in speech and vote as a Republican believing in the protective tariff. In the debate upon that bill I used the following language:

> Some Republicans have seized upon a statement made by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to the effect that this was a revenue measure, containing no protective features, as a reason why this bill should not receive the support of any Republican. Mr. Chairman, nothing that the gentleman from Alabama may say about this bill, and nothing that any other gentleman may say about it, can change its character. Whether it is protective or not depends upon the bill itself and not upon what any man may say of it.

I later said:

> Taking the bill as a whole, I assert that it is not only protective in principle, but affords that measure of protection pledged by the platform of the Republican Party.

Mr. Chairman, that was my view then. It is not my view now. The report of the Tariff Board shows that I was mistaken. I believed then that the rates in the bill fairly measured the difference in cost of production at home and abroad.

but the report of the Tariff Board shows that many rates in that Democratic tariff bill were very much higher than were necessary for the protection of the American industry, and instead of being a bill in accordance with a tariff-for-revenue-only theory, it was a bill that afforded a measure of protection greater than any Republican standing upon the Chicago platform could defend, when all the facts were ascertained.

This is what this Tariff Board has done, and I want to say if there is anyone on that side who disputes that I shall be glad to have him interrupt me. It has compelled the Democratic majority to either bring in a bill much lower than the one last year or else become the party of high protection which they have been denouncing for these many years. They have taken the latter course and now clearly stand for a protective tariff higher than is warranted from a protection standpoint.

Now, the proof of the statements I have made.

The first paragraph in the Democratic bill related to cotton thread and yarn. It carried duties from 10 per cent to 20 per cent ad valorem. The Tariff Board finds that the difference in cost of production is from 3.8 per cent to 11.9 per cent ad valorem instead of from 10 to 20 per cent as found in the Democratic bill. (See report, p. 9.) This finding does not include yarns of the highest count, but the board states that it does include—the great mass commonly manufactured in the United States.

What has been said of paragraph 1 applies also to paragraph 2.

Coming next to paragraph 3 of the Democratic bill relating to cotton cloth we find rates of duty ranging from 15 per cent ad valorem to 30 per cent ad valorem.

Again turning to the report of the Tariff Board we find that although wages are higher in this country, the actual cost of production of plain cotton cloths is less in this country than in England, growing out of the fact that American weavers tend more than twice as many looms as do their English brothers. (See report, p. 11.)

I quote from the report on page 12—

The labor cost of turning yarn into cloth in the United States is not greater, and in some cases is lower than that in England.

And again on page 13—

Figures are presented in the report showing that although labor costs in the cotton industry are in many cases lower in the United States than in England, yet the actual hourly earnings in this country are, in most of the principal occupations, greater.

The board also gives samples of cotton cloths upon which comparisons were made. Upon more than 40 of the samples the cost of production was less in this country than in England, and with the exception of a very few of the others an ad valorem duty of from 5 to 20 per cent would cover the difference in the cost of production. So here in that great staple, cotton cloth, the Tariff Board shows conclusively that the rates in the Democratic bill can not be sustained upon the theory of a tariff for revenue only and, indeed, can not be sustained from a Republican standpoint, for they are in excess of the rates measured by the standard fixed by the Chicago platform.

Again, in this same paragraph, the Democratic bill adds a duty of 5 per cent ad valorem upon cloth when bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, printed, or mercerized. Upon this item I quote from the report of the Tariff Board:

A comparison of 50 specific samples for which finishing data were obtained shows that in most cases the differences between the charges in the two countries were slight, but the American charges were slightly lower on most of the samples.

Therefore that item in the Democratic bill can not be defended from the Democratic standpoint, for it imposes a burden upon the American people solely for the enrichment of the tariff barons whom our Democratic friends have so roundly denounced.

I will not go into a further discussion of the items in the Democratic cotton bill compared with the report of the Tariff Board, as that detailed examination will be more in order when the cotton schedule shall come up for consideration in the House. My sole purpose at this time in making these comparisons is to show that our Democratic friends, in preparing their cotton bill at the last session, acted without sufficient information, and that because of that lack of information, instead of presenting a bill carrying rates based upon the theory of a tariff for revenue only, their bill was, in fact, a high-protection measure, a measure carrying such excessive duties that with the information we now have from the Tariff Board, Republicans must condemn it, because the rates are too high. I am not, of course, unmindful of the fact that it was a reduction from the rates in the Payne-Aldrich law, but I do say that even with that reduction the rates were excessive from both Republican and Democratic standpoints.

I want to emphasize the proposition that upon such an article as cotton cloth, that great staple necessary to all of the American people, the rates in that Democratic cotton bill could not have produced any revenue. Do you not see that if a manufacturer in this country can make a product for less than it is made abroad, that there can not possibly be any considerable importations by a foreigner? Do you not see that when you impose a tariff rate of 15 per cent, as you do upon cotton cloth, it can not be for revenue? Do you not see that the only result that such a rate can have is to enable the American manufacturer to raise his prices that 15 per cent to the American people and thus enable the American manufacturer to exact an excessive profit from the people? Is that what the Democratic Party stands for? And yet when you offer this cotton bill again at this session as you have done to-day it is exactly what you have stood for; it is exactly what you have for many years been condemning the Republican Party for standing for.

Our Democratic friends have chosen to ignore the report of the Tariff Board, thus attempting to discredit it, but in their attempt to discredit that report they find themselves in a most peculiar position of advocating tariff rates, ostensibly from a revenue standpoint, that are in fact absolutely prohibitive and much higher than any protectionist sincerely standing upon the Chicago platform can indorse.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to devote a few minutes to what the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. UNDERWOOD, in his ignorance, said about his Democratic cotton bill at the special session. I do not use the word "ignorance" in any reproachful sense. I mean only a lack of knowledge which has now been supplied by the Tariff Board.

I have already conclusively shown that the most important paragraphs in the bill carried rates so high that protectionists upon this side, with the information they now have, could not indorse them. Our Democratic friends did not know then that their rates were too high, so high that they would produce no revenue. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. UNDERWOOD, in opening the debate upon the bill, said:

I believe the rates in this bill are purely revenue rates.

I wonder if he will repeat that statement now in view of the report of the Tariff Board.

A colloquy then occurred between the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], as follows:

Mr. HINDS. The gentleman says this cotton bill is framed solely to the end of the revenue in view?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think the gentleman can doubt that proposition.

Mr. HINDS. Therefore does the gentleman say also that it leaves out entirely the principle of protection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Absolutely; so far as my knowledge is concerned.

I do not think Mr. UNDERWOOD will repeat that statement to-day, for he has a vastly greater knowledge of the subject owing to the work of the Tariff Board. I have conclusively shown that the rates contained in the Democratic bill were much too high. Now I desire to discuss for a moment what this report of the Tariff Board on the cotton schedule alone will be worth to the American people in dollars and cents, using Democratic methods of computation.

The Democratic bill reduced rates from 48 per cent ad valorem in the Payne-Aldrich law to 27 per cent ad valorem. The report of the Tariff Board shows that they should be reduced to about 20 per cent ad valorem. In the debate upon the Democratic bill, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], a member of the Ways and Means Committee, stated:

It is believed by our committee that the revenue will not be materially disturbed and that the burden of taxation upon the American people will be lifted to the amount of $200,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON stated that the reductions in the Democratic bill would save the American people $200,000,000 per year. Adopting the Democratic method of computation—which our Democratic friends can not object to, although I do not say that it is correct—if their bill would save to the American people $200,000,000 per year, a bill framed in accordance with the findings of the Tariff Board would save the American people more than $260,000,000 a year, or, in other words, this Tariff Board is worth more than $60,000,000 a year to the people in the cotton schedule alone, and yet Democrats refuse to appropriate $250,000 for its continuance, when, according to their theory, it will save the American people $60,000,000 a year. Is this another evidence of Democratic economy?

One other suggestion. The Democratic majority propose to pass their cotton bill. I have undertaken to show—and if I had more time I could show in greater detail—that their rates in that bill are higher than can be defended from a Republican standpoint. They expect to pass that bill through this House, and they expect to pass that bill through the Senate, and they expect that it will go to the White House for action. A year ago without this information from the Tariff Board I am frank to say that in my judgment the cotton bill would be vetoed, as it was vetoed when combined with other schedules, and the President of the United States then would have taken the position as he did upon that and other bills that he desired to wait for the report of the Tariff Board; but now, if you pass your cotton bill through the House and Senate, I say now and here that the President of the United States will be compelled to sign the bill. There is not any question about it, because if there be any objection to it from a Republican standpoint it is that the rates are too high. Are you legislating for the American people, for the public welfare? If you admit the report of this Tariff Board is such as to compel the President of the United States to sign a tariff bill that you have passed, is not this Tariff Board worth many times more than it cost in the past, and is it not worth many times more than it will cost in the future?

In conclusion, I want to call attention to the fact that the reports of the Tariff Board on both the cotton and woolen schedules are unanimous. The members of that board consist of Republicans and Democrats, one of them a former distinguished member of the Democratic side of this House. There has been no politics in the work of the board. Both of the reports condemn by the facts found the schedules in the Payne-Aldrich law with which they deal. The information is as necessary to the Democrats as to Republicans. If we are here trying to represent the great American people, trying to serve a common country and advance the public welfare, we will continue this board.

I have no great affection for the present President of the United States. I have freely voiced my criticism of many of his acts in the past, but the Tariff Board which he has appointed has rendered a great and lasting service to the American people. Instead of abolishing it we should give it a permanent status, provide for publicity of its findings, make it answerable to Congress as well as the President. If you Democrats fail to do this in this Congress a Republican Congress will do it next year. From a partisan, selfish standpoint I should be glad to see the Democrats abolish this board, but as representing 200,000 American citizens, putting country above party, I ask the Democratic majority to continue this board that it may go on with its work until the tariff issue shall no longer be the football of politics and furnish occupation for the lobbyist. Let us go before the people with the clean-cut issue of a protective tariff or a tariff for revenue only, and when the people decide that question, let us apply facts found by an impartial board to whichever theory may be adopted, and we will have done that for the American people which will do much to again place the Congress of the United States on the high plane from which it has fallen. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. One moment. I desire to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

[Mr. GILLETT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HEFLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On June 3, 1912:

H. R. 5602. An act authorizing the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association to occupy and construct buildings for the use of the corporation on lots Nos. 3 and 4, block No. 114, in the city of Hot Springs, Ark.;

H. R. 23634. An act to authorize the village of Oslo, in the county of Marshall, in the State of Minnesota, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North; and

H. R. 20586. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

On June 4, 1912:

H. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution to authorize and direct the Great Northern Railway Co. and the Spokane & British Columbia Railway Co., in the matter of their conflicting claims or rights of way across the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, in the San Poil River Valley, to readjust their respective locations of rights of way at points of conflict in such manner as to allow each company an equal right of way through said valley; and in case of their failure so to do, to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Interior to readjust said rights of way; and

H. J. Res. 323. Joint resolution authorizing Charles F. Riddell, cashier in the office of the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives, to sign all checks, requisitions, and papers in the place of U. S. Jackson, Sergeant at Arms, to obtain money appropriated for the salaries and mileage of Members of the House of Representatives during the temporary disability of the said U. S. Jackson.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD].

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, in attempting to make, from a manufacturing standpoint, an analysis of the report of the Tariff Board I shall be very pressed for time within the space allotted to me, and I ask of my fellow Members in the House the courtesy of proceeding without interruption. If I can finish within my time, I shall be glad at the close to answer any questions that I can. The Tariff Board has now made three reports—that upon wood pulp and print paper, that upon wool, and that upon cotton. The first of these I had the privilege of analyzing briefly in an address before the House on August 1 last. I desire now to analyze the report upon wool and manufactures of wool and to say a few words only upon the report upon cotton—a few words only upon cotton, because in the few months that have elapsed since that report was presented, on March 26, there has not been time to make any thorough and deep analysis of that report.

THE TARIFF BOARD.

I have tried to listen with an open mind to the comments made on this floor and in the press on the report of the Tariff Board on wool and manufactures of wool submitted by the President December 20, 1911. The words "magnificent, exhaustive, and complete" have been used to describe the report. The President said, "It is a monument to the thoroughness, industry, impartiality, and accuracy of the men" who made it, and his praise spurred my desire to learn just what the report is, what it says or fails to say, what it implies, and to what action it seems to lead.

I must admit having said that it was "too much to expect that the report of the Tariff Board shall have serious value as a basis for taxation" and having agreed with the American Protective Tariff League that "production cost in our own country is so widely variant as to be of little value." Practical difficulties in the very nature of things seemed to prevent the board doing its work in such a way as to have real merit for the purpose for which it was meant.

For example, it was noted that it would not be sufficient to show that goods of the same weight, width, and character cost so much here and so much less abroad. It would be necessary to show not only that the quantities made at the time these costs were taken were alike, but that the mills were alike in equipment, management, and other conditions affecting cost. An American mill badly located, with poor equipment and inefficient labor, could not properly be compared with a foreign mill superior in these respects till it was shown that none of these conditions were alterable; and if the conditions in the foreign and domestic mills whose goods were thus compared were unlike as to burden cost, this should plainly appear, for like must be compared with like or the differences must be pointed out. Facts are the outcome of conditions, and the conditions are an essential part of the facts; and when the fact sought is the cost of production, the elements that make that cost and the conditions under which that cost arises are essential to understanding the cost itself. To say that goods cost so much made in a certain place merely raises the question "Why?" and the answer to that question may combine many elements. The board itself said of pulp and news-print paper, "The costs in a single mill vary greatly from month to month." Finally, it was then pointed out that statistics given by a mill may not be conclusive about that mill. The real facts lie behind, often unknown to the mill management, yet, perhaps, controlling the cost. These words from a former address illustrate this principle:

> Let us know, then, the conditions of cost, the causes of cost, that Congress may discriminate. If a tariff is to be based on costs, all the factors must be made clear, else the cost itself merely misleads.

With this mental background, I read so much of the report as relates to the manufacturing processes; there has been no time to study the production of wool itself. If my reasoning before the report appeared was wrong, no one needed to know it more than I. Not one member of the Tariff Board had, to my knowledge, any experience in actual manufacturing. If they could learn in a few months what years had taught me it was difficult to find, and could overcome in that time obstacles to knowledge with which many able men had long struggled, clearly there was something wanting in my thought and experience and in that of other manufacturers. A woolen manufacturer had told me it would take five years to study exhaustively that one industry, but perhaps he was mistaken. Therefore let us, as thoughtful men seeking to learn, look at so much of this report as deals with manufacturing and see what we find.

It would be foolish to deny that that report has brought into public view many facts about the woolen industry that were before it known only to the initiate. It is a glossary or thesaurus that has value as a work of reference. Skill has been shown in the collecting and collating of statistics and in their arrangement. Nor is there a question that the board has been impartial and industrious, nor even that within certain limits it has been both accurate and thorough. The board has sought the truth in a sincere spirit and has stated such truths as it has found in a clear and correct way. The character of the gentlemen composing the board and their repute as statisticians gave assurance that this would be so, and it is so. Such weaknesses as the report may show arise not from intent, but from limitations of time, opportunity, experience, and training and from the essentially impossible nature of the task the board was set to do.

It seems normal, therefore, and to arise without personal fault on the part of the Tariff Board, that their report should be, as plainly it is, incomplete, indefinite, and superficial. It is superficial in the respect that it ignores the whole question of management—that vital factor in industry, so vital that two mills side by side with like equipment, but with different management, may one show failure and the other success. The board says "mills may show differences of cost because of difference in local advantage or skill of management," but admitting this truth they fail to deal with it. It is superficial because it deals solely with the financial side of costs and omits comment on the social and physical conditions under which the human factors live and work; yet this human factor is the greatest element in production, and, according as it is well or ill conserved, costs vary largely. The report is superficial because it ignores many other elements that cause cost and deals superficially only with results and not fundamentally with the causes of those results.

The report is incomplete because it covers only a portion of the industry, whether reckoned by establishments or equipment or employees.

It is indefinite because it fails to state out of what conditions the facts it gives arise. It states an average; it does not tell us fully either the best or the worst the industry does, still less does it tell us the best that the industry can do or can be made to do. Let us be specific. There were 913 establishments making woolen and worsted goods in 1909. The board does not state this. I take it from the census report of April 4, 1911. Of these the "agents of the board visited 188 different mills," say, 20 per cent. I wrote the Tariff Board March 26, 1912, for the reason why so many were unvisited, and my secretary received a telephone reply that they had not time to visit them all. Out of the 188 there were 14 from whom no results of practical use could be had, and some others besides the 188 declined to permit agents of the board to visit them. The board gives the names of the mills from which information was secured. It does not say which mills declined information. One mill, which is efficient, is not upon the visited list, and I am told by what I think sound authority that the owners of this mill have said they do not care about a tariff to protect their manufacturing process because they are efficient enough to take care of themselves. It is but natural that the name of such a mill should not appear on the visited list, for they might fear to give away the results of their initiative. On the other hand, there do appear in the list of mills visited several of which I have some personal knowledge. One of them keeps its cost records in the head of its owner. Several others are located miles from railway transportation and operated at such a burden cost as would injure, if not destroy, an industry that was not sustained under unsound conditions by law.

But we come back to the 174 mills visited, which are said to be "representative of the industry in this country and comprise over two-thirds of its productive capacity." When, however, the examination of labor and machine efficiency was made, 130 of these mills were ignored and 44 used as the basis for the report. We are now reduced, therefore, to 44 out of 913, or less than 5 per cent of the mills in the country, on which to base a report as to labor and machine efficiency. These 44 mills had, when running full, 44,500 employees, or 27.8 per cent, a little over one-fourth of all the employees in this industry in 1909. Of these, 35,029 responded to the inquiries of the board, and the information concerning employees, wages, and so forth, in volume 4 of the tariff report is based upon these replies; that is to say, upon statements from three-fourths of those employed in 44 out of 913 mills when the 44 were running full; or, to be more exact, upon replies from 21.5 per cent, say one-fifth, of the total employees in the industry in the United States. To state this differently, the Census Bureau says "there were an average number of wage earners in this industry employed in 1909 of 162,914." From these the Tariff Board has replies from 35,029, leaving 127,885 from whom no word is heard; 78.5 per cent of all are silent.

I confess not to accept as final the statement of the President as to the report being "exhaustive" when we have no word at all respecting the conditions surrounding nearly four-fifths of the operatives.

Be it here noted that, while possibly the 44 are types, we have no evidence of that. We do not know which they are or where they are or the conditions under which they work. We only know that 44 out of 913 mills and 35,029 out of 162,914 persons are made the basis of this part of the report.

We pass to equipment, taking looms as a convenient unit. There were in 1909, 72,185 looms in the United States. On page 949 the board says:

In the establishments investigated by the Tariff Board—

Whether the 174 in part or whole or only the 44 is not clear—there were 18,634 looms, or 25.8 per cent of all.

But on page 1051 of the same volume data are given based on only 11,080 looms, which is but 15.4 per cent of all in the United States, and these last data therefore omit to deal with 61,105 looms, or 84.6 per cent of all.

That is to say, that in dealing with the productive efficiency of looms the board's data is based upon less than one-sixth of the looms, omitting over 61,000, and upon 33 establishments, omitting 880. Again the few mills and the small proportion of looms may be typical. We do not know. The report does not say where they are, how they are located, under what management they run. But this is not all. There is still other confusion about these looms. Let us put the statements of the board thus:

There were in this industry in 1909 72,185 looms.

There were in the 174 mills from which information came to the board (p. 613, vol. 3) 46,280 looms.

There were in the establishments investigated (p. 949, vol. 4) 18,634 looms.

There were investigated—we are not told how—(p. 22, vol. 1) 12,337 looms.

There were used to get get weaving data (p. 9, vol. 1; p. 1051, vol. 4) 11,080 looms.

Just what the relations are between these various quantities of looms to one another and to the results in the report are not, I confess, clear to me.

The report does not show the systems or lack of systems used in keeping costs in the mills from which this information is derived. It has been assumed, apparently, that there were thorough and accurate costs kept, and that as a matter of fact the manufacturers know what their goods cost them; and yet I doubt if this is so. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], in his address of March 30, stated "from the books of the company elaborate tabulations were made showing the costs of material and work in every particular and with the most painstaking accuracy."

Delightful! But what if the books of the company were not properly kept?

Last fall a friend told me that the head of one of the largest woolen manufacturing companies telephoned him to come down to his office; that he had something unique to show him. My friend went, and told me the thing he showed certainly was unique. The woolen manufacturer had put together in one column all his outlay for the year—wages, expenses, interest, taxes, fuel, everything; and in another column opposite he had put the total yards of cloth made that year. Then he divided the total outlay by the total yardage, and said to my friend: "Look at that. There is what my goods cost me per yard last year. Did you ever see anything like it?"

And my friend, with a straight face, told him he never had, and then went on to ask questions, such as "How many different kinds of goods do you make in a year?" The man said, "About 40." "And these differ," said my friend, "in width, weight, weave, and material, do they not?" "Oh, yes," said the man. "Do you know what each kind costs?" "Oh, no, no," he said, "I do not know that." "Do you know what it cost for any one of them per yard for spinning or for weaving?" "No; except the piecework rate." "Do you know what it cost per yard for any of the other processes in your mill?" "No." "Do you know whether each department in your mill runs at a loss or profit, and, if so, how much?" "No," he said.

Now, in that case the books of the company would not be quite the purest light possible on the way of truth. [Applause.] Indeed, the board itself says (p. 627) such a method would "give no result of any value" and is "utterly meaningless."

Again, an agent of the Tariff Board told me he had visited 16 establishments in the knit-goods portion of the inquiry. I asked him if they knew what their goods cost. He said, "No." I asked him whether these 16 establishments had any system of keeping their costs. He said, "No," and he said, "I got accurate costs all right. I found them out for myself. I stayed in the mill a week and studied the thing until I got what was right." And he also said some of these manufacturers said to him, "The Government ought to employ men like you to go about and tell us manufacturers how to keep our costs."

I asked a young man whom I had known for years and who was employed in the office of one of the largest woolen companies whether they kept any accurate continuous record of the costs of manufacture in each department of that mill. He said, "No."

The Tariff Board have been looking for one of the most elusive and difficult of facts—for a fact which is the outcome of hundreds of other facts—which results from the combination and reaction of facts mechanical, facts human, facts financial, facts economic, facts physical. Such facts can not be predicated on the basis of a short period nor picked up in a week nor collated from defective or unscientific records, and such facts are more delusive than helpful when they are merely financial, based upon results without considering, or at least without stating, the facts that cause those results.

It is one thing to say that we do not manufacture at a certain cost; it is quite another thing to say that we can not do so. The board tells us something about the difference in expense of producing goods here and abroad. It does not tell us so much about the difference in extremes of cost between American mills, for the tables of cost we shall discuss later are confined to but few out of many mills, and even as they are they make the theory of basing a tariff upon the difference in cost so absurd as to be a joke. It is not the duty of Congress to sustain a lot of derelicts, or to make the American people pay 67 per cent more for their cloth than they can buy it for abroad merely to promote continuous inefficiency. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The board might have told us what the results would be of combining the best American practice so that we might know, not what the industry requires under its present condition, but, rather, what at its best it might under the protective theory be said to need. This it omits to do. But the board does render a public service when it points out the "wide difference in efficiency and cost," but still more when it says that "in general the lowest labor costs per pound were in mills paying the highest wages," and states the further truth, "Frequently it is found that high wages and low labor costs go together." [Applause on the Democratic side.] This is a crushing blow to the theory that protection is needed to sustain American wages. As the final death stroke to this worn-out fiction, take the words (p. 9) of the Synopsis of the Tariff Board's Report on Schedule I (cotton):

> As is well known, wages or earnings are not necessarily an index of the labor cost of any particular process of manufacture. The labor cost per yard depends on the relation between wages and output.

Referring for a moment to the report on Schedule I, cotton, we may note certain salient features of it. In the first place, it frankly admits that the report is based on but 81 out of 1,324 mills, or 6 per cent. It gives the list of the mills visited. From those mills are omitted many of the best concerns in the land. In particular I note the omission of that mill in New England which, more than all others, has been distinguished for the individuality and the initiative of its owner, and I note also that it omits the name of one of the most successful and prosperous mills in the South, from whom I shall presently read a letter. But its report does show again and again and again the extreme variations in cost, which make it impossible to predicate any judgment as to the tariff tax upon the cost of manufacture.

But out of this wool report, with all its omissions and failures, two large facts emerge. The first is that after many decades of protection woolen and worsted manufacturing in this country is in many ways a backward and inefficient industry; and the second truth is that the attempt to base a fixed protective tariff on the differences in the cost of production between the United States and other countries is absurd.

There are four elements in which the woolen and worsted industry is shown to be backward and inefficient by the report. These are in the equipment, the standards of production, the relative wages paid, and the management.

They say the dead can not speak to us, but this is not true of the wool industry, for behold these words:

> The old mills for all practical running purposes are as good as the new. There are certain wearing parts in a machine which, if renewed from time to time, keep the machine as good as new. This will apply to all machinery. Where the mill has a good machine shop, and where the standard of mechanical conditions is high, whenever a machine is not "right" it will be stopped and made "right." If that is maintained, age is not serious.

It is hard to believe that this is not a voice from the ancient world or the Middle Ages. It has a sound of the outer darkness and a ripe medieval flavor. It is, however, a statement from page 1044 of the report made by a woolen manufacturer who thinks he is running a modern industry. I read this statement in Detroit recently before a group of factory men, every one of whose establishments had been either created or born anew within 20 years. On page 7 of the preface to Modern Industrial Progress, the author, Mr. Charles H. Cochrane, says:

> To-day the industry is exceptional in which there has not been an entire alteration and renewal in the machinery used within 15 years. Machines have to be thrown into the scrap heap more often because they are too slow and out of date rather than that they are worn out.

And the board itself, on page 376 of its cotton report, makes this clear statement:

> A modern mill, equipped with looms of the latest construction, which have been in operation only a few years, will manifestly have an entirely different repair account from that of a mill with looms anywhere from 20 to 50 years old. Not only will the efficiency, and therefore the resultant labor cost per unit of product, be different in the two mills, but the actual expenses incurred for repairs will be vastly greater in one case as compared with the other.

What are the facts in the woolen industry?

Of scouring machines, 19½ per cent have been in use over 15 years and 12 per cent of them over 20 years.

Of the carding machines in the worsted mills, 31 per cent have been in use over 20 years.

Of the carding machines in the woolen mills, 55 per cent have been in use over 20 years and 39 per cent over 30 years.

Of the Noble combs in the worsted mills, one-third have been in use over 20 years and 22 per cent over 25 years.

Of the French combs in the worsted mills, 21 per cent have been in use over 20 years.

Of the drawing frames—Bradford system—in the worsted mills, 18 per cent have been in use over 20 years.

Of the French drawing frames, over 20 per cent have been in use over 20 years.

Of the spinning frames in the worsted mills, 24½ per cent have been in use over 20 years.

Of the worsted mules, 30 per cent have been in use over 20 years.

Of the woolen mules, 20 per cent have been in use over 20 years.

Of the looms in both woolen and worsted mills, 23½ per cent have been in use over 20 years and 40 per cent over 15 years.

But this is not the worst. The figures which I have given, from tables on pages 1021 to 1040, inclusive, of the report, relate apparently to the 44 mills mentioned on page 949 as those in which labor and machine efficiency were investigated. These 44 (out of a total of 913) had more than one-fourth of all the employees in the industry. It must therefore be assumed that they include some of the best mills, else the report would be a sham. It is certain that among the 869 that are omitted were most of the worst mills, and if among the selected 44 the facts are as above, imagination fails to picture the antiquity and decrepitude of the apparatus that the many mills employ, and it is in large part upon the output of these hoary and venerable relics that our people depend for their clothing. It is to this pass that the woolen industry has come under protection; paying the lowest or almost the lowest relative wages in America; operating mills filled with mechanical wrecks. It wonders why its costs are high; complains of its inefficiency; charges us 67 per cent more for the same goods than the price at which they are sold abroad, and cries for a continuance of 90 per cent duty. [Applause.] The picture is shocking. Deprived of initiative; lost to the sense of self-help; supinely content with excessive costs; living in the stone age of industry. This is the general spectacle revealed to us. This much is true of free competition—it tolerates no inefficiencies. This much is true of our present policy, that under it gross inefficiency survives at our cost. True it is, as the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] wisely said in his speech of March 29:

> In the textile industry we can no longer boast of the superior efficiency of American labor or machinery, but rather that we are laggards in the race with England and France in both respects.

But this is not the whole. The standards of the industry are low. The report says 80 per cent of loom production on worsteds and 70 per cent on woolens are the manufacturers' desired standards of efficiency (p. 23).

In a large New England machine shop some months ago the manager found his automatic machines running at 80 per cent efficiency, and not content therewith sought to improve them. By raising the pay of his men and by instructing them and by the study of time losses, in a short time he brought the efficiency of all those machines up to 96 per cent. I said to him as we went about the works, "No doubt you daily see things you can improve." He said, "I have taken note of four such this morning." In that man's attitude of mind and self-criticism lay the best protection that house could have. [Applause.] It is an old phrase:

> Who aimeth at the stars
> Shoots higher much than he that means a tree.

But men who are content with 70 and 80 per cent efficiency condemn themselves by their very standards. For the report shows that it is not necessary to set the standards so low, because there are cases in which they are exceeded. On page 1049 it appears that three woolen mills average over 75 per cent of loom efficiency, and the following page shows that four worsted mills average above their standard, while individual cases ran far above the standard set, so that a standard exists which is actually less than the best performance. Hardly a high ideal. We may assume, of course we do not know, the report does not say, that in certain mills the standard is high, but the tables of productive loom efficiency that we get cover but 43 mills. What shall be said about the standards of the 880 that are not named? And, although the standards are needlessly low, yet the sad fact is that out of the 21 woolen mills, on page 1049, 13 fell below the standard, and out of the 22 worsted mills, on page 1050, 18 fell below the standard. If one studies the data for 11,080 looms, on page 23, the following facts appear:

Wool standard, 70 per cent—2 per cent of looms reach 90 per cent, 12.9 per cent reach 80 per cent, 21.6 per cent reach 70 per cent, 36.5 per cent reach or exceed standard, 45.4 per cent reach 50 per cent, 18 per cent below 50 per cent, and 63.4 per cent fail to reach standard.

Worsted standard, 80 per cent—4.1 per cent of looms reach 90 per cent, 24.7 per cent reach 80 per cent, 28.8 per cent reach or exceed standard, 30.9 per cent reach 70 per cent, 34.1 per cent reach 50 per cent, 6.2 per cent below 50 per cent, and 71.2 per cent do not reach standard.

So that low as the standards are, whether we reckon by establishments or by looms, but a small proportion reach them. Yet that the standards are too low and that a higher standard can be reached in practice is also shown by the fact that the records, both by mills and by looms, tell of cases where the present standards are largely exceeded.

The efficiency varies from mills in which 19 per cent of the looms show less than 40 per cent efficiency to others in which 32 per cent show over 85 per cent efficiency. How can a fixed tariff tax cover differences in productive costs of such a range?

It is interesting as showing what is done under different conditions in another textile industry to read from a letter dated March 5, 1912, from the Republic Cotton Mills to the Draper Co., these words, showing what they accomplish on plain cottons with the Northrop automatic loom:

> During 8 months our loom efficiency has averaged 112 per cent. We have averaged 0.9816 per cent firsts, and we have a reputation established for our goods with the best eastern converting trade that is second to none. In fact, we get the preference right along, and the best buyers prefer our goods. We mention this to show you that we are not sending out seconds for firsts. We have, as you know, 600 looms, and our total number of weavers running these looms are 23, an average of 26 looms to the weaver. We have 2 weavers in our employ running 40 looms each. We have no trouble of any kind and our work is running beautifully. We have no trouble securing the best weavers in the country, as our work runs so well they are anxious to get a job with us.

No wonder that the Draper Co. say:

> This letter shows what can be accomplished in a mill which is not hampered by traditions.

This is one of the mills that is omitted from consideration by the Tariff Board in its report on cotton. I call attention to the fact that the Tariff Board suggests in its cotton report that it is the best practice in the mills it investigated to have 28 looms for 1 weaver, whereas this mill writes they are running 40 looms to each of 2 men, showing the board might have got some information if they had consulted this mill. And, further, the average in this mill of looms to weavers is higher than the average suggested by the board in its report.

By contrast, if testimony is needed to confirm what the report reveals of backwardness in some textile mills, it appears in these words of Mr. Eugene Szepesi:

> There is a certain plant that I have in mind, a cotton-manufacturing plant using old machinery. They have old-style spinning frames; their mules are almost any to 1800. Their looms have been running 32 years. You can imagine how efficient this plant is. That plant is actually running at, we figured, something like 42 per cent efficiency. * * * All that manufacturer can do is to throw out his old machinery and start anew to bring up his efficiency. It is the waste of management, not of the worker, which has brought him down to this low figure.
> [Applause.]
> They are working with machines which are absolutely not much better than scrap iron.

And also in this further statement:

> I had a mill where 37 per cent of the looms were idle because of repairs.

The statement of Mr. F. G. Patterson, auditor of the Pacific & Atlantic Mills, at the Dartmouth conference of last October, is also illuminating:

> I have been working in textile mills * * * all my life, and I find that the information which it is necessary to have is not in the offices. * * * There are few costs used in the textile industry. The costs that they now have are made up semiannually or annually and are based upon estimates which are made at the time the cloths are first introduced, multiplied by the yards made, perhaps, and then an adjustment made to equal the actual expenditures. You will find that method in use in most of the textile mills.
> People ask, "What good are costs if they are not got accurately? The goods are not sold according to those costs." That is very true; but there is a deficiency in the textile industry which is a very marked one. We are much behind the steel and shoe industries. We are now where they began. We are not getting our operation statistics accurately; we are only getting our balance sheets semiannually or annually. They can be obtained monthly, and are being obtained monthly in two textile mills that I know of, but I know of only two in this country.

These words from an experienced mill accountant I commend to the attention of the committee.

But the frankest admission of the use of the tariff to conceal inefficiencies appears in an article in the Iron Trade Review, of Cleveland, which says:

> The American iron and steel industry requires a measure of tariff protection by reason of the fact that a number of improvements in methods and appliances have been made abroad, but have not secured general adoption as yet in the United States.

Could there be a plainer statement of the fact that the tariff is wanted because an industry is backward?

It is normal that along with poor equipment and low standards should go low relative wages, for the intelligence of the industry appears upon the whole not to have risen above the point where it is deemed economy to get the cheapest labor to be had. Then they groan because it is unproductive. If, again, we may take the 44 mills with which volume 4 deals as typical and forget that there are 869 others about which nothing is said on this point, it appears that 40 per cent of all the workers get from 10 to 14 cents an hour (p. 997), and 56 per cent of all are paid within the limits of 10 to 16 cents per hour, while over 11 per cent get less than 10 cents per hour. More than half the women (57.4 per cent) receive between 10 and 14 cents per hour. Just here it may be well to quote from page 1009:

> In two worsted mills where the average earnings of weavers were low * * * the average efficiency was less than 70 per cent. In those mills the great majority of the weavers did not earn over $8 per week.

Under these conditions labor is normally restless, and we are not surprised to find (pp. 962 and 963) that though 46 per cent of all the workers had been in the industry over five years, but 29.5 per cent of them had been in one mill five years and 27.7 per cent of them less than one year. Furthermore, it is obvious that many attempt to support themselves by working in this industry, fail, and leave it for other work, so that into and through and out of the mills flows a constant stream of strangers. Out of 9,722 persons who had worked less than a year in the mill where they were employed more than three-fourths had worked less than a year at that occupation.

"The mills," says the report, "are at a disadvantage because of the large proportion of new and inefficient workers." And it is obvious this must be so. The conditions revealed are such as to make these mills the abode of the ignorant and the inefficient. The bright and clever men and women pass on to more productive labor or refuse to enter at all, and the weaker and less intelligent remain, and this will continue to be so as long as the industry is managed on its present basis.

And yet a word of caution is needed, because the figures in the report apply to but 35,029 out of 162,914, and we only know by inference as to the majority. The constant ebb and flow of inefficient labor appears, however, in the fact that though in 1910 but 13,233 persons were necessary to fill the positions in certain mills, yet 28,421 were hired in these mills to take the places of those discharged or who quit of their own accord (p. 984), or 115 per cent more than the average number at work. Not 50 miles from the centers of the textile industry in Massachusetts, where such conditions prevail, is a mill that has no trouble in getting 1,500 intelligent working girls, nine-tenths of them of American birth, to work at good wages, with such efficiency that the mill products go to 50 countries. There is a waiting list of applicants at this mill. Compare the record of changing labor in the woolen industry with a shop in Brooklyn employing 550 men, where in 14 years a total of 166 men quit or were discharged, an average of 12 yearly, 1 a month. Possibly it partly explains this to add that in the Brooklyn shop an average wage of $17 weekly is paid, exclusive of all officers' salaries.

For the cause of the ancient equipment and the low standards and the inefficient labor we look to the fourth element revealed by this report, namely, poor management. It is not necessary to practical men to say much on this phase. The facts already cited tell it beyond all question of denial or explanation. Side lights upon it may be of interest, however. According to Industrial Organic Chemistry, wool grease can be profitably extracted from raw wool as a by-product, of which a value of $3.75 can be produced for 60 cents. The author of Modern Industrial Progress says (p. 591) that two or three million dollars' worth of wool fat and potash are still allowed to run to waste. The owner of a woolen mill who said his efficiency was 65 per cent saved none of this grease, and told me it did not pay to do so. I have not found this and kindred practical matters discussed in the report of the Tariff Board. The general index furnished by them contains nothing under the head of by-products. For a certain use it was necessary for the board to obtain the exact number of yards woven and the time used in the weaving. The report on page 1046 uses these significant words, "The mill records did not contain this information." And here I recall the words of the secretary of the National Association of Woolen Manufacturers:

> This question of costs has been receiving increased attention from woolen and worsted manufacturers in the past few years.

Note those curious words, "the past few years."

On page 1047 is a pregnant allusion to "the idle time of the weaver when not working on loom production, such as waiting for new work, for filling, or for breakdown of the loom," and on the following page is shown a record of time lost in stoppages, said to be 16.7 per cent. This is an error in figuring. It should be 20.2 per cent. Again, it is interesting to note from page 629 that "the practices of the mills regarding depreciation are at the best as crude as they are varied," also that "imperfections in the carding and spinning often" (note that word "often") "make lumps in the yarn, which in most cases break in the weaving and have to be tied." It is suggestive to read, page 629, "as near to the actual costs as the mill itself was able to make them," and on page 627, that "wastes made in successive processes vary both with the skill and efficiency of men and machines and also with the business policy of the management." From page 954 it appears that over 20 per cent of the total force are "engaged in the general work that is necessary about any mill." These are nonproducers and distinct from the productive and supervising force. The proportion is large and makes a heavy handicap upon the industry. It is, however, taken from the 44 mills and from but 21½ per cent of the total operatives. It may be worse or better if the whole industry were known. We can not tell. It may be worse or better in some of the 44 mills. The report does not say. But it is hard to believe that under the best conditions and with keen management and well-paid labor it would be necessary to employ anything like one-fifth of the total force at nonproductive or indirect labor. And here again the board fail to enlighten us as to the best practice or the possible practice. We might have had a bright light on such matters had there been upon the board a manufacturer who could have said, "This may be true, but it is all wrong to have it true." Nor does the report tell us anything definite as to the extent to which accurate cost data are kept. We get such statements as, "In most mills no system of advancement exists from one class of work to another" (p. 965), and when the weaver has to wait for filling "this loss of time must be charged to the lack of efficiency on the part of the establishment" (p. 1045).

But, further than that, there are wide variations in cost and equipment and efficiency and wages and in many other elements; further than a general statement as to these things we get very little, though we are told (p. 641) that in the same mill the cost of similar "tops" varied from 4 cents to 9 cents per pound. Certainly it is true that the board had to find out some costs for themselves. Some information, doubtless, was furnished of value by some mills. We do not know which or where or to what extent, and still less do we know, respecting the statements of costs which are made up, the conditions which cause them and out of which they rise. It seems certain to me that if there had been one or more mills maintaining accurate, scientific, continued series of costs under the charge of competent accounting officers, showing the profit and loss in each deparment over a period of time, that this would have appeared in the report or its existence have been made known. The absence of any statement from any mill of a complete tabulation of manufacturing costs covering all processes, allowing for wastes, by-products, and burden charges, and showing production on a modern scientific basis, is one of the most significant facts about the report. [Applause.]

As a close to this part of my argument let me quote from a letter of April 9, 1912, to me from C. E. Knoeppel, Laporte, Ind.:

> If concerns would put their conditions in the best possible shape, if the daily activities were properly coordinated, if operations were standardized, and the men paid the best possible wages, the matter of cost and wages would be a small factor compared with the gains that could be realized through the elimination of wasteful practice and furnishing encouragement and incentive to the men.
> Manufacturers should consider their men as assets and forget about wages as expense. If they would do this, if they would take more pains in conserving their energies, directing their efforts, and encouraging them in their work, not only would there be less labor trouble, but costs and prices would strike a much lower level and the men receive more in wages.

But the report we are discussing shows more plainly than anything else the absurdity of a tariff based on alleged differences in the cost of production. Let us see how costs differ between American mills—recalling again that we are dealing with but 43 or 44 mills out of 913—and in order to show the common fallacies more clearly, let us show side by side for each of many processes the variations in the hourly wage rate and in the actual labor cost:

Process.	Page.	Hourly wage rate varies from—	Labor cost per 100 pounds product varies from—
Scouring	1022	12 to 18 cents.	5 to 34 cents.
Carding, worsted	1024	10 to 17½ cents.	19 to 69 cents.
Carding, wool	1026	9½ to 16 cents.	62 cents to $3.02.
Combing (Bradford system)	1028	9 to 13 cents.	48 cents to $1.70.
Combing (French system)	1030	10 to 13 cents.	86 cents to $1.46.
Drawing (Bradford)	1032	9 to 14½ cents.	$1.17 to $3.22.
Drawing (French)	1034	10½ to 14½ cents.	$1.45 to $2.23.
Frame spinning, worsted	1036	6 to 13 cents.	$1.38 to $4.66.
Mule spinning, worsted	1039	12½ to 19 cents.	$2.24 to $6.20.
Mule spinning, woolen	1041	11½ to 27 cents.	$1.18 to $3.61.
Looms, woolen	1049	(1)	(2).
Looms, worsted	1050	(3)	(2).

[1] Efficiency varies from 55.09 to 78.80 per cent, or 43 per cent.
[3] Efficiency varies from 52.28 to 87.66 per cent, or 67 per cent.

It is perfectly evident from the above that inasmuch as the labor cost per unit of product varies out of all proportion to the hourly wages, that the latter element is not the sole controlling factor that fixes the labor cost. This last is effected by many elements other than the hourly wage—by the run and the kind of yarn and by other factors which may be summed up in the one phrase "quantity and character of product," or, as the board says, page 645, "figures will vary widely according to the output."

Take a few examples in detail. On page 1022, mill No. 4, with an average hourly wage rate for machine operatives of $0.1499 and for supervision of $0.3298, has a labor cost for scouring of 5 cents per 100 pounds. Mill No. 14, with an average hourly wage rate for machine operatives of but $0.1216 and for supervision of $0.2416, has a labor cost for scouring of 21 cents per 100 pounds—lower wage rate, but four times the labor cost.

In the carding process, page 1024, mill No. 15, with an hourly wage rate of $0.1186, had a labor cost of $0.69 per 100 pounds, while mill No. 3, paying an hourly wage of $0.1318, had a labor cost of but $0.19 per 100 pounds. A higher wage rate and less than one-third the labor cost.

In the work of combing, page 1028, three mills making substantially the same count of yarn—Nos. 7, 8, and 9 mills—show a variation in labor cost per 100 pounds from 1.08 to 1.38, and the mill with the lowest labor cost pays the highest average hourly wage rate.

In spinning, page 1036, mills Nos. 4 and 5 make nearly the same average count of yarn. No. 4 pays to machine operatives $0.1329 hourly rate and has a labor cost of $1.80 per 100 pounds. No. 5 pays $0.1178 hourly and gets a cost of $4.31 per 100 pounds.

The piecework rate for weaving a 50-pick fabric varies 25 per cent—7.90 to 9.77—between six mills (p. 1015).

Many more examples could be given from the report to show that even within its meager scope the fact comes clearly out that any attempt to cover by a fixed tariff the difference in labor cost is absurd. The cost of turning yarn into cloth varies in the United States from 60 per cent to 170 per cent higher than the English cost, according to fabric (p. 17). The difference between United States and Germany, the board says, is less. Shall we provide a separate tariff for each country and for each fabric from each country? Even if so, how shall we provide for local differences in wage and management and conditions within each country, for (p. 16) the board says there "are wide variations in both countries from mill to mill"? The thing would be a joke were it not serious. If ever a fiscal theory had its bottom knocked out, this is it. Let it be thrown in the scrap heap of our financial history never again to raise its diminished head. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It has been a source of great gain to what our board pleasantly calls our "more highly organized establishments" (p. 996). It has kept alive an assorted lot of industrial derelicts, but its day is over. Soon there will be "none so poor to do it reverence." Over its early and welcome grave let this extract from page 256 be written:

The work done by one comb, one spindle, one loom, or one person in one country is not necessarily equivalent to the work done by a machine of like name or a person in another country.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

The speed of a spindle may be greater in the United States than in Germany; the looms of the United Kingdom may run more picks to the minute or have on the average a wider reed space than the looms in France; the production turned out by a man or woman in an American mill may be greater for a given time than by a man or woman abroad.

What, then, is the value of our Tariff Board? It has shown substantially that the Democratic wool and cotton bills were based on knowledge and were right and wise. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It has developed that tariff studies under "rush orders" are as incomplete as they are expensive. It has been a costly but not a conclusive experiment. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The work it has attempted to do may—so far as it is feasible at all—be better done and done more cheaply as the regular duty of a particular bureau given ample powers and charged with a continuous rather than a sporadic effort and inquiry. Another epidemic or spasm of tariff study is not needed. A careful continuous inquiry into all the facts of industry, covering a long period of time, can not but be useful. There is room for a bureau of domestic and foreign commerce which shall gather and digest facts relating to our own and foreign industries. There seems no special requirement for a board confined to tariff study. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Costs can not be predicated on a few mills or a short period. Already in some of the mills on which report is made the facts given are altered. The Tariff Board has come, lived its feverish and troubled life, and will turn over its work to a more efficient and continuous successor, which will, we trust, learn from its career that industrial problems can not be grasped with a "hop, skip, and jump," and that in manufacturing the unseen rather than the obvious facts are controlling. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But the experiment has not been in vain if we have learned that it is as wrong to tax ourselves to support inefficient mills as to sustain incompetent doctors and lawyers. Attention having been called to the cost of production, we have found that to be a complex and difficult subject, variable in nature and multiform in character. Even by those who have long studied the science of costs the exact relations of its various elements are not always known.

The threats of reducing wages to keep cost down are, however, now known to be merely indicative of the ignorance of those who make them concerning the causes of cost.

The Democratic Party repudiates the idea of proceeding with tariff reform in ignorance. It seeks the widest truth; it is not content with half truths. It will not deal with our industries in an impatient or drastic spirit. It recognizes that upon our industrial prosperity the welfare of us all largely depends. Silent mills and closed doors have no charm for us. But we repudiate the industrial baron; we require the industrial servant. Our industrial philosophy is that of Him who said, "He that would be greatest among you, let him be your servant." [Applause on the Democratic side.] We would substitute for a protective-tariff platform a new declaration of industrial independence. We offer an affirmative, not a negative, teaching. We would replace protection with self-help, childhood with manhood, shackles with freedom. Our industries will never be as strong and sturdy as they ought till they become self-reliant. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For such self-reliance the Democratic Party hopes, and hopes with the strong confidence of a friend and not with the sinister design of a foe. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CLAYTON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6777. An act to authorize the board of county commissioners of Horry County, S. C., to construct a bridge across Kingston Lake, at Conway, S. C.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5428) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," approved February 19, 1909.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, how much time has been used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has used 2 hours and 45 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois 1 hour and 40 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, by direction of my colleague [Mr. CANNON] I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, down on the Isthmus of Panama we are completing the most spectacular and monumental work ever undertaken by man. Culebra's mighty gash, the concrete canyons of the locks, the stupendous dam of Gatun, all stand unique in grandeur among the works of man.

The manner of accomplishment has been in honorable keeping with the magnitude of the undertaking. Science and courage conquered the terrors of the climate, trained and unerring judgment laid the plans, genius wrought and industry executed, and devotion and loyalty of the highest order marked the mighty consummation.

To have accomplished the task is heroic; to have achieved it in the manner of its accomplishment is glorious. No useless sacrifice of life, no needless suffering or pain, no unseemly bickering or strife, no turmoil or disorder, no hint or stain of scandal has dimmed the luster of the achievement.

The roll of those who blazed the way, who planned the work, who directed and performed it, is one long roll of honor—the commanders, the captains, and the loyal soldiers of a mighty triumph of peace.

Soon all will be finished, and over the watery stairs the huge leviathans of the deep shall pass from west to east, from east to west, and the water girdle of the globe will be complete.

And now the question confronts us, What shall we make the history of the great waterway? Shall we give it a birthright of peace in keeping with its glorious purpose, or shall we fling open the portals of the temple of Janus and dedicate it to the god of war?

The decision is with us. The responsibility is ours. As we sow so shall our children reap. Shall we bequeath to them in this mighty enterprise a legacy of peace and power, or shall we create a heel of Achilles whose every wound shall give them pain and torment?

I hold it to be a truth susceptible of the clearest demonstration that every consideration of good faith, of prudence, and of patriotism urges us to invite all the civilized world to join with us in establishing and maintaining the complete neutrality of the canal for all time.

I maintain that only by such an arrangement can the canal be made of lasting and permanent benefit to our people. Any other course will involve vast expense, and in time of war will defeat the useful and beneficent purposes for which the project was undertaken.

I shall not at this time enter upon a discussion of the question of our right to fortify the Panama Canal. I regret to have to say that, in my opinion, some of our people do not particularly care what our treaty obligations are in the matter. At any rate, no nation is likely to question our right to fortify. So far as I know, no nation has any objection to our doing so. The great nation with which we now have a treaty purporting to neutralize the canal is evidently not unwilling that we shall fortify it.

I base my opposition to the fortification of the canal on the ground that it involves vast and needless expenditure, running so long as time shall last, and that instead of being a benefit and a defense, fortifications will be in time of war, whether we are engaged or not, a source of endless trouble and embarrassment, and if we are engaged, of weakness and disaster. Fortifications invite bombardment; unfortified places are exempt from bombardment by international agreement.

COST OF FORTIFICATIONS.

For the sake of argument, let us assume that we are to fortify the canal. What will be the cost? The first estimates of the initial cost of fortifications at Panama, including quarters for a comparatively small number of men, were between twenty and twenty-five million dollars. These estimates did not, however, include all the work and batteries that would be necessary to protect against either a sea or land attack. It must be borne in mind that if we are to fortify the canal it is as important that it be defended against land attack on both sides as that it shall be protected against attack from sea at either end. In fact, in case of war with any formidable power the canal is more likely to be attacked by land than by sea. In any event, any serious and determined attack by a powerful enemy is certain to be by land and sea simultaneously. We must therefore estimate for both land and sea defense; and taking these matters into consideration, as well as the fact that the first estimates for war defense are invariably too low, it is most conservative to estimate the ultimate cost of the complete fortification of the Panama Canal, including the necessary quarters for garrisons, at $50,000,000.

The smallest force that has been estimated as adequate to guard the canal if we fortify is from 8,000 to 10,000 men of all arms; the latest official estimate is 12,000. Such a force would be expected to protect the canal against an ordinary landing party from a hostile fleet, but would not be expected to be sufficient to hold the canal against an expeditionary force. To maintain such a body of troops in the Tropics will cost from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 annually. Renewals and repairs of fortifications would cost at least $5,000,000, or a total of at least $20,000,000 and probably $25,000,000 per year for purely military purposes. Thus the cost of fortifications and troops for the first 15 years of peace would amount to the cost of the canal, and this does not take into consideration the enormous expenditure now proposed for naval stations at Panama.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Those figures pertain only to armament?

Mr. MONDELL. My estimate of $50,000,000 was for land fortifications and quarters for men. My estimate of $25,000,000 annually is for the maintenance of those fortifications and pay and keep of the men.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And they have no reference to the maintenance of the men who operate the canal?

Mr. MONDELL. None whatever. This is purely military outlay. The estimate of first cost of fortifications is $50,000,000. It would be unnecessary to spend any dollar of that if we are not to fortify the canal. It will cost at least $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 a year for upkeep and garrisons, and no dollar of that would be necessary if we were not to fortify the canal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's estimate, then, is a side issue altogether, and has no reference to the commercial aspects of the canal at all?

Mr. MONDELL. Absolutely not at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Or to its maintenance in any way as an engineering enterprise?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all. No part of the sums I am referring to would have to be spent if we did not fortify the canal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit one more question?

Mr. MONDELL. With pleasure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think during the whole of the discussion of the Panama Canal bill we had no information from anyone as to that country from which an attack might be expected upon the canal. I would like to know whether the gentleman, in his inquiries among military men, has been able to determine from what country, if any, we are likely to have an attack and what nation would be inspired to take the Panama Canal?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will bear with me, I expect to discuss that in detail a little later.

Fortification of the canal means therefore an outlay, even though we have no war, of a sum sufficient to build four Panama Canals every century, and this must, under the plan of fortification, go on forever. How vast the outlay would be in case of war no one can estimate, and how fruitless it would be I will attempt to point out later.

THE RESULT.

What benefits will this vast expenditure bring us? In time of peace nothing, for no protection is needed. In time of war to which we are not a party the fact of the canal being a fortified place will increase our difficulties if belligerents meet there. In case of war in which we are engaged if our enemy commanded either approach to the canal, and particularly the Caribbean Sea, the canal would be blockaded and our fortifications would be useless—"as idle as a painted ship on a painted ocean." On the other hand, if we commanded the Caribbean Sea with our Navy the fortifications would be unnecessary.

If we were at war with a really formidable power desirous of seizing and holding the canal, the harbors at a convenient distance on either side of the Canal Zone afford favorable opportunities for landing troops for a land attack. No fortifications at the termini of the canal can protect against such an attack. Command of the adjacent seas by our Navy would prevent it.

The fortification of the canal makes it our one vulnerable point of attack in case of war. An enemy would be likely to first strike there because of its being far remote from our continental base; and the canal, if taken, a valuable prize. Instead of being able in some measure to select the scene of conflict, we would be compelled to accept the gage of battle at the point our enemy selected. Thus Panama would be a veritable heel of Achilles. Our fleets must concentrate there and an army must be dispatched and maintained amid the dangers of that tropical climate to guard against expeditionary forces. There is scarcely a civilized nation with which we would not be at a disadvantage in such a conflict, limited as we are in transport fleets; and after all, the outcome would depend on our Navy. If we lost control of the sea, our hold on the canal would be precarious, only to be assured by the utmost exertion and at enormous cost. How foolish it would be when it can be avoided by holding the canal neutral.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it be of any more use to anybody else if they took possession of it, if fortified, than it would be to us fortified? The gentleman said it would be a very valuable possession to some foreign nation if it took possession of that canal.

Mr. MONDELL. I assume that the canal, which will cost us $400,000,000, is of value.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it be any more valuable to them than it would be to us?

Mr. MONDELL. If the canal is fortified, it can be lawfully taken as a prize of war and held after the war is over unless we defeat our enemy and can compel its restoration.

Now I come to the point which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] suggested—Who do we expect a war with?

FORTIFICATIONS AND WAR.

Let us assume that the canal is fortified; that we have spent $50,000,000 for fortifications and $50,000,000 more for a naval base or station, and for years have expended from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 annually for upkeep of our military works and another $15,000,000 a year for troops, and that eventually we have a war. It is difficult at this time to conceive the possibility of a great foreign war; but if we are to fortify, it must, of course, be in anticipation of such a war, and therefore we must concede that such a war is possible.

Let us assume the altogether improbable contingency, that we have a war with Great Britain. No one pretends to believe that we could hold the Caribbean Sea, the Atlantic end of the canal, against such an enemy. To attempt it would necessitate the use of our entire Atlantic Fleet in that region, leaving our Atlantic coast unprotected. The enemy having blockaded the Atlantic end of the canal, it would be useless and valueless to us. Whether or no a land attack was made would depend upon what terms we were willing to make with regard to use of the canal for merchant ships. If we were willing to allow all merchantmen except our own to pass through, such an arrangement would probably be agreeable to the blockading squadron. If we insisted that our merchantmen or none should use the canal, none would use it as long as we held the waterway, in which event the enemy would probably make a land attack.

We might be able to hold the canal against landing parties from a blockading fleet, in which event England, with her vast transport fleet, could in a very short time land an expeditionary force sufficient to take the canal. Having lost control of the Caribbean Sea, we could not transport an army or make a landing except possibly by way of the Pacific, which, assuming it could be done, would be so long delayed that the canal would be taken and held as a prize of war, open to all the world except ourselves.

Nor must we forget that a new engine of war of seemingly tremendous efficiency for destructive purposes is being rapidly perfected. An aeroplane launched from the deck of a hostile ship outside the fire zone of our fortifications, or from any vantage point in the surrounding territory, can easily drop explosives powerful enough to destroy the locks and put the canal out of commission.

Against such a procedure on the part of England may be urged the treaty under which she pledges her support against blockade of the canal, but such an argument can scarcely be made by those who are insisting on fortification on the ground that treaties of neutrality are made to be broken. Furthermore, our treaty with Great Britain guarantees the passage of warships at all times, and as fortifications are being primarily urged to prevent our enemy in war from putting vessels of war through the canal, it must be assumed that if we fortify we expect to prevent England, in case of war with her, from putting her fleet through; and if we did that, we ourselves would be the first to break the treaty, thus relieving England of all responsibility under it.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to, although my time flies.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. As the gentleman seems to be going upon another point than the right to fortify——

Mr. MONDELL. I am going to get to that later, and refer to it very briefly, because I realize that the arguments of expediency are sufficiently forceful to convince those who do not seem to care anything about treaties—unfortunately there seem to be many such.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Before the gentleman leaves the question of expediency I want to ask him a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I have just started on this question of possible war, and if the gentleman will let me work out my war game after I have gotten through with that I will be glad to yield to him.

But it will be said that war with Great Britain is impossible; that in any event Canada is a hostage against such an eventuality. Accepting that view of the matter the inevitable conclusion is that in any event we are not fortifying against Great Britain. Against whom, then, are we fortifying?

Let us substitute Germany or France for Great Britain and see how the war game would work out. Germany has a larger navy than ours, France a smaller. With the canal fortified it becomes a prize of war to be blockaded and taken, if possible, and deemed desirable on the part of our enemy. It would be the one point of our possessions which a European fleet could reach as quickly as our own. The result would be a naval battle in the Caribbean Sea. If we were successful, the canal fortifications would be needless and useless. If we were defeated, the canal could not be held long against landing parties and not at all against expeditionary forces which would follow the enemy's victorious fleet. Whatever happened later or elsewhere, the enemy would have a prize of war of vast value, to hold with the fortifications we had built, or to destroy, as seemed advisable.

It may be said that we might have war with some other nation with a less powerful fleet than ours, and without sufficient landing forces to make a successful land attack. Such a nation could establish a blockade which it would be necessary to break, and this could only be done by our fleet; and if our fleet destroyed or disbursed the enemy's fleet, the fortifications would again be useless.

There still remains for consideration the oriental power which our rampant militarists love to scare us with whenever a large naval appropriation is desired—the alleged yellow peril, Japan; therefore it is incumbent upon us to plan a war with Japan with Panama fortified.

The ghost dancers, who develop a fine frenzy at the thought of this friendly power 8,000 miles away, solemnly assure us that Japan could most any day take and hold our Pacific coast. If this be true, the canal would be easy picking; a Japanese fleet could blockade and render it useless, and the landing of a force sufficient to take the canal would be a summer picnic.

But, assuming that no attempt were made by any power with which we might be at war to do more than blockade the canal, we would be unable to get a fleet through it, or if we did we would be compelled to accept the gage of battle with conditions as disadvantageous as those which surrounded Cervera's fleet when it issued from the harbor of Santiago.

A NEUTRALIZED CANAL.

So much for fortifications. Now, let us see what the situation would be without fortifications and with the canal neutralized by action of all the great powers. Of course, I am assuming that it would be possible to secure such a pledge of neutralization and mutual protection as we now have with England. Does anyone doubt it? I think not; at least I have heard no suggestion that Panama could not be placed on the same plane as Suez.

It is to the interest of all the great powers to agree to such a plan, not because they have any objection to our spending our money building fortifications if we want to do so but because they all expect to have merchant fleets using the canal regularly and desire to have the passage of such fleets uninterrupted in event of war.

Assuming, then, the canal neutralized and all free to use it in war and peace, what would happen in case of a war to which we were a party? There would be no temptation for our enemy to take and hold the canal, for under the laws of nations it would not be a prize of war, and therefore any nation rash enough to attempt it would be compelled to give it up and be subjected to heavy penalties unless all the nations of the world repudiated their solemn treaties in favor of our enemy.

But, shout our jingoes, "It is unthinkable that we should allow our enemy in war to put his ships through our canal." That sounds big and bold and appeals to the unthinking. Why not allow our enemy to put his ships through our canal if by so doing we can save hundreds of millions in time of peace and, in any contingency that can be conjured up by a normal mind, will be better off in time of war.

It has often been said that the canal doubles the efficiency of our Navy because it gives us a short route from one coast to another. That is a pretty figure of speech which never was and never will be more than one-half true. Let us assume, however, that with the canal and a reasonable area of sea at either end neutralized, in time of war or threatened war, we desired to put a fleet through the canal, that procedure would be perfectly safe and feasible and we would come through ready to fight.

Conjure up if you can any contingency under which any possible enemy would want to use the canal in time of war with us for the passage of a fleet. For an illustration, let us assume again it were possible for us to have a war with England. What part of her fleet would she desire to put through the canal? The canal not being available as a prize of war, England's Atlantic fleet would strike us along our Atlantic coast or in the West Indies; her Pacific fleet would strike our eastern possessions or our Pacific coast. The conditions under which she would desire to put a fleet through the canal are unthinkable.

The same reasoning would apply to any other European power with still greater force. The most lively imagination can not evolve a theory under which Germany or France, for instance, in case of the improbable contingency of war with us, would have any reason for putting a fleet through the canal. We would keep them busy on the Atlantic, and if they had fleets on the Pacific they would be much better occupied attempting to take our rich ports there than in chasing through the canal to strike us on the Atlantic.

But, again, we must not overlook Japan, or our alarmists will insist that we are already wiped off the map. In case of the utterly improbable event of a war with Japan, that power will be very busy, first in the Philippines, next in Hawaii, and if successful there, along the California, Oregon, and Washington coasts; even Alaska as a prize of war would be of great value to Japan, while a neutral canal would be of no value at all. As for Japan desiring to send a battle fleet through the canal, it is unthinkable.

Of course, it will be claimed by our militarists that international neutralization is an "iridescent dream"; that nations will disregard all treaties if it is for their interest to do so. If this be true, why are we urging peace treaties, why has all the world laid down laws governing the conduct of civilized war, prohibiting the bombardment of unfortified places and protecting private property on land in time of war, and how does it happen that these rules are not violated?

It is not true, as every student of history knows, that treaties of neutrality are disregarded, and it but proves the rule to quote the few exceptions to it.

But admitting, for the sake of argument, that our own Nation or any other nation might, under stress, throw to the winds all solemn treaty pledges, does it follow that all the world would allow the wanton disregard by any one nation of obligations to which all were a party and the observance of which was to the highest and best interest of a majority of all nations at any given time.

The interests of all nations are served by maintaining an open canal at all times. When an important section of the ships of all the maritime nations shall have adopted the canal as a portion of regular or intermittent voyages, a blockade or closing of the canal will be a most grievous hardship. All the world's commerce wants with the canal is the right to use it on fair terms; these terms must be given or the world's fleets can not and will not use it in competition with other trade routes.

The nationality of the ownership of the canal, if it is neutralized, is not material to the commerce of the world, but unquestionably all of Europe and Asia prefer our ownership to that of one of their own number. Therefore it would at all times be to the interest of a majority of the nations of the world to keep the pledges all had given.

Does the most pessimistic and doubting soul believe that the nations would brook the violation by any one or two of them of a pledge to which the honor of all were bound and in the keeping of which all were benefited? To put it in concrete form, if all the civilized nations joined in a pledge that the canal was to remain neutral and unfortified for all time, free from seizure and blockade, does anyone believe they would allow Germany, for instance, or Japan, to seize the canal or blockade it? And if such or any other power did so, would not the world join in a demand for complete restoration? And do we expect to become so weak and pusillanimous that we could not force upon any nation that attempted to flout the pledge of all the world a final settlement which would fix the neutrality of the canal for all time?

As a matter of fact, the canal is now neutralized and will remain so without any further treaties if we do not commit the stupendous blunder of fortifying it. Our treaty with Great Britain neutralizes it, unless we forfeit that neutralization by an act of war. The formal and official assent of the civilized nations, as I have suggested, would be wise, but would not be absolutely essential if we do not fortify and do make it clear that we interpret our treaty with Great Britain in accordance with its letter and spirit as establishing a canal open at all times to the ships of all nations.

Now, I will yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Simply upon the argument the gentleman has developed with regard to expediency the gentleman has developed an argument that it will be much safer not to fortify the canal property, because if fortified it becomes open to an attack by belligerents.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Would that same argument of expediency apply to the question of the fortification of New York Harbor or any other strategic point in this country?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no; the gentleman knows it would not apply to the same extent. One involves the maintenance of our national integrity, the prevention of attack upon our homes and firesides, the other the question whether or no we will use a great canal that we have builded thousands of miles away from our shores for the purposes for which it was originally intended, or place ourselves in a position where it will be the one vulnerable point that an enemy will strike and where we will be at the greatest disadvantage.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Is not one just as truly our property as the other?

Mr. MONDELL. Not in the same sense, as the gentleman knows. I am sorry I have not the time to go into that, but my time is limited, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I do not think the gentleman has cleared up the subject by any manner of means.

Mr. MONDELL. The two propositions are so dissimilar that there is no reasonable comparison. The one refers to a great work of commerce, far from our shores, a work designed to accomplish certain specific purposes. The other to our homes and property which we must defend and care for, we can not neutralize all our territory. We are proposing treaties of arbitration, the effect of which we hope would be to largely avert war everywhere; but all the nations of the world would be glad to join with us now in the neutralization of the Panama Canal. Let me further call the gentleman's attention to the fact that New York City, for instance, to which he has referred, is to a certain extent neutralized, together with all unfortified places, by international agreement. We have fortifications at the entrances of New York Harbor, but no fortifications at New York. If an enemy were to reduce the fortifications at the entrance to the harbor he could not, without violating the rules of war, bombard New York, because it is not fortified. What we propose at Panama is to carry the idea of exemption from bombardment and capture still further.

NAVAL BASES AT PANAMA.

Of late a new scheme has been hatched by military ambition in connection with the canal. It is now proposed to establish a fortified naval base or station at one or both ends of the canal, and this means an additional expenditure of fifty or one hundred million dollars, depending on whether we are to have one or two. I have purposely avoided discussing at length our right to fortify the canal, but if we have any such right it can only be for the purpose of defense. It is clear that neither our treaty with Panama or Great Britain authorizes the use of the Canal Zone as a military base, independent of the needs of protection. Such right of war is expressly prohibited by article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. But again, if we had full authority to do this thing, it would be the height of folly to attempt it. We have a naval station in Cuba at Guantanamo, we have on the Pacific ports and bases nearer the canal than any other strong nation, and it would be folly to establish a base or bases at Panama if we had the right to do so.

We have a most important outpost at Hawaii. If Pearl Harbor were fully fortified and protected, no hostile fleet would ever cross the Pacific, and we would be doubly secure if we were to fortify Pago Pago in Samoa. These are natural bases which, if strongly fortified, no Asiatic nation would send a fleet with hostile intent beyond them. But whether they be fortified or not the Canal Zone should never be.

And yet the sundry civil bill, which provides for the Panama Canal, does not carry a dollar for the most important of all our outlying fortifications—the fortifications of the islands of Hawaii.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire to say to the gentleman it would not be in order to carry them on this bill; they are carried on the fortifications bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it is not——

Mr. SHERLEY. It is in the fortifications bill.

Mr. MONDELL. A small amount.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no; there is everything they ask. It will be one of the most strongly fortified places in the world.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope it will be; it should be.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know it will be.

Mr. MONDELL. But I am afraid it will not be if the present parsimonious policy of the majority side of the House continues.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, that has nothing to do with the facts. They got all they asked for for the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to know that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am glad to inform the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Because, as I have said, Hawaii is a natural naval base, and if Pearl Harbor is strongly fortified no Asiatic power would send a fleet with hostile intent beyond it.

OUR RIGHT TO FORTIFY.

I have based my argument against fortifying the Panama Canal on grounds of expediency; those grounds are amply sufficient to condemn this act of stupendous folly; and if our people are so unmindful of their often expressed purpose in the building of the canal, and so careless of their solemn obligations as to overlook and ignore them, they should at least harken to the arguments of self-interest.

The fact is, however, that our right to fortify the canal for the purpose of closing it at our pleasure or denying its use to any and all comers is prohibited in express terms by our treaty with Great Britain and by reasonable implication by our treaty with Panama.

Article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, ratified February 12, 1902, is as follows:

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th Ocober, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case, shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

Taken by itself or in connection with the convention of Constantinople, which it substantially adopts, this treaty clearly contemplates a neutral canal.

No words can be plainer or clearer than the words in the treaty of Constantinople neutralizing the Suez Canal, which are adopted by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; they declare that the canal shall be "forever free and open to all nations, in time of war as in time of peace, to all vessels of commerce or of war, without distinction of flag."

The treaty of February 26, 1904, with the Republic of Panama grants us "the perpetual use, occupation, and control" of the Canal Zone for the "maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection" of the canal, and "for those purposes" grants us the right to fortify. No fair interpretation of this language would authorize us to build or use fortifications as a war asset or without a view of closing the canal, for to do so would not protect it, but place it in jeopardy; and, in any event, nothing in this treaty could absolve us from our obligations under the treaty with Great Britain.

But it will be urged that Great Britain has not objected to our building fortifications at Panama; certainly not. Why should she? The mere fact of our spending millions in fortifications at Panama does not absolve us from our obligation under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty not to exercise "any right of war" or commit "any act of hostility" within it; and no such right or act can be exercised or committed within it without violation of our treaty obligations with Great Britain.

This being the state of affairs, we could not fire a hostile shot at Panama, except for the purpose of preventing damage to the canal, if the zone bristled with guns and was swarming with soldiers. In other words, we have no right to prevent Great Britain at least, and by a fair interpretation any other power, from passing ships of commerce or of war through the canal at any time.

By the terms of the treaty Great Britain is equally obligated with us to protect the canal. If we are simple enough to spend hundreds of millions for the alleged purpose of protecting the canal, thereby largely or wholly relieving Great Britain from her share of the responsibility, while at the same time the right to use it is at all times hers, why should she object?

It is said that the great war lord of Germany, in a conversation with Col. Goethals, approved of our fortification of the canal. There is nothing strange about that; the German Emperor is enough of a military man to know that our fortifications would count for nothing in the improbable event of hostilities between his country and ours, if the German Navy were strong enough to whip us in the Caribbean Sea. If it were not, an attack on the canal would be not only impossible, but of no lasting value. Furthermore, the German Emperor is having a hard time to get his Parliament to vote money enough to carry on his military program, and any expenditure anywhere for war perhaps gives him additional argument for his ambitious plans.

OUR NATIONAL POLICY.

In our silly aping of the fortified camps of Europe, in our foolish ambition to keep abreast or in the lead in the mad race for armaments which is bankrupting Europe, in our sinful vanity to make a vulgar display of our power as some people do of their wealth, we have entirely overlooked and forgotten our real purpose in building the great waterway.

Let us revert for a moment to what some great Americans representing the view of our Nation at the time they spoke no less than the true sentiment of our people now, have said on the subject.

In 1826, Henry Clay, Secretary of State under President Adams, said:

> If this work should ever be executed, so as to admit the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe alike.

President Polk in a message to the United States Senate in 1847, speaking of an Isthmian Canal, said:

> The interests of the world at stake are so important that the security of this passage between the two oceans can not be suffered to depend upon the wars and revolutions which may arise among different nations.

In 1858, Mr. Blaine, as Secretary of State, wrote our minister at London as follows:

> The United States recognized the proper guaranty of neutrality as essential to the construction and successful operation of any highway across the Isthmus of Panama.

In 1885, the only President the Democratic Party has elected since the Civil War, President Cleveland, said:

> Whatever highway may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two great maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit, a trust for mankind, to be removed from the chance of domination by any single power, nor become a point of invitation for hostilities or a prize for warlike ambition.

Coming down to the very recent past, we have the declaration of President Roosevelt in a special message to Congress, as follows:

> The principle enunciated by Secretary Cass was sound then and is sound now.

How does it happen that we have forgotten the words of wisdom thus uttered, unless it be because we have temporarily been listening to the voice of the alarmists, the jingoes, and the militarists, and have failed utterly to consult our judgment and counsel with our sense of honor, prudence, and discretion. We talk loudly of world-wide peace and strenuously advocate international arbitration; we proclaim ourselves a nonmilitary and peace-loving people; and yet we propose a policy with regard to Panama which the armed nations of Europe refuse to apply to Suez. Was there ever such an exhibition of blind inconsistency? I can not believe that we shall reverse our fixed and announced policy toward the canal, repudiate or ignore our treaty obligations, and plunge into the expenditure of hundreds of millions to do a thing which is not only a wicked and useless waste of the people's money, involving a sordid sacrifice of valuable lives in the Tropics, but will, in the day of test and trial, prove to be utterly vain and purposeless.

Do we realize what our militarists are leading us into in this matter? I fear not. For a time we were assured that the building of the canal would practically double the effective force of our Navy. Now we are told that we must spend as much as 10 battleships would cost to make this doubling of naval strength effective. Next, we must spend as much as 10 more battleships would cost to supply a base at the point where the doubling of effectiveness is supposed to be accomplished. Following that we must, according to these same military experts, spend at least $25,000,000 per annum for upkeep of fortifications and for men to insure the doubling of effectiveness, and lastly, the Navy now informs us that as the control of the sea at the ends of the canal is necessary to its protection in time of war, which is true, we must increase the size of our Navy. After having followed, as well as I am able, this tangled maze of alleged military and naval necessities growing out of the canal, I am convinced that it would be infinitely cheaper and more effective to keep a goodly fleet on both oceans, and forget we have a canal at Panama. The fact is, however, as I have already pointed out, that the canal will be of real service to our Navy, both in war and peace, without spending a dollar to protect it, and only in this way can it be of service in war.

Let us disabuse our minds of the idea that the canal can ever be a valuable war asset—"an outer line of defense"; "an outpost for military operations." Its character and situation render it valueless for these purposes. It is essentially a work of peace; our national contribution to the comfort and convenience of the world's commerce as well as our own. Our great statesmen have all so recognized it—only a temporary spasm of military madness suggests any other view of it.

We are fortunate that our treaty obligations are in harmony with our highest and best interests in this matter; that only by observing our promise to neutralize the canal can its safety be assured. We are further fortunate that the canal will be highly useful to us by affording a short route for our Navy from one coast to another without necessitating any expenditure on our part to keep it free from blockade. We are fortunate that it will be, for all time, to the interest of at least the major portion of the world, to keep the canal open and free from blockade, for thus the keeping of treaty obligations which the world is willing to assume will be a matter of self-interest as well as international honor. As a truly peace-loving people, in spite of our jingoes and alarmists, we are fortunate that we have the finest opportunity ever presented to a people to dedicate an important section of the world's highways of commerce, to permanent tranquillity, and at the same time serve our highest and best interests.

Of course it is not proposed that the canal shall be left at the mercy of cranks, evil-minded persons, or irresponsible bodies of marauders; our ownership demands, and our treaties recognize such protection. A small force a few hundred men at most, a few rapid-fire guns, and the canal is as well protected against any such possible danger or damage as though it frowned with 16-inch guns at both ends and bristled with bayonets along its entire length.

Dedicated to peaceful commerce, secure by the world's pledge, it will soon become one of the busiest highways of the world's trade. With no military load to carry it will soon, under fair rates of toll, invite a volume of traffic which will pay all operating expense and probably bring us a fair return on our outlay.

A policy of neutralization is not in derogation of our national dignity; it rather enhances it. The fact that we are a great power not only makes imperative our duty to secure the canal from the fortunes and vicissitudes of war, but renders it easy for us to do it. We therefore emphasize our national dignity and at the same time make all the world our debtor in building this great highway for the world's commerce and dedicating it to perpetual peace. It will be our glorious contribution to the hastening of the day when the horrors of war shall cease and all the world shall nobly contend for the blessed victories of peace. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] such time as he may desire.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the anti-injunction bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 6777. An act to authorize the board of county commissioners of Horry County, S. C., to construct a bridge across Kingston Lake at Conway, S. C.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 6614. An act to authorize the construction of a pontoon bridge across the Red River of the North between Pembina, N. Dak., and St. Vincent, Minn.;

S. 125. An act to permit the American Academy in Rome to enlarge its purposes, and for other purposes;

S. 2530. An act granting to the city of Twin Falls, Idaho, certain lands for reservoir purposes;

S. 4791. An act authorizing the patenting of certain lands to rural high-school district No. 1, of Nez Perce County, Idaho;

S. 6508. An act to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in the Chuckawalla Valley, Cal.;

S. 4572. An act to designate Walhalla, Neche, and St. John, in the State of North Dakota, subports of entry, and to extend the privileges of the first section of the act of Congress approved June 10, 1880, to said subports; and

S. J. Res. 72. Joint resolution making provision for the Fifth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, change of reference was made of the bill S. 6380, an act to incorporate the American Hospital of Paris, from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in connection with my remarks certain statements prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury relative to public buildings.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PAY OF AMERICAN OFFICERS IN CUBA (S. DOC. NO. 760).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of War with reference to the receipt by the three officers of the United States Army detailed for service in connection with the army of the Republic of Cuba of pay and certain allowances from the Government of Cuba.

It seems proper that these officers, who have been placed, at the request of the Government of Cuba, in a position where, by the nature of their official duties, they have had to incur considerable additional expense, should be authorized to receive the additional pay and allowances which the Government of Cuba has generously tendered them.

I recommend that the consent of Congress be given as requested by the Secretary of War.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 4, 1912.

LATE REPRESENTATIVE ELBERT H. HUBBARD.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, it is my solemn duty to announce to the House the death this morning of Mr. ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD, a Member from the State of Iowa. Thus ended a life full of useful and faithful service and of one who was universally respected. At some future time we shall ask that a day be set aside on which to pay proper tribute to his memory.

I now offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 571.

Resolved, That the House has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD, for eight years a Representative from the eleventh district of the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed by the Speaker to attend the funeral at Sioux City, Iowa, and that the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for properly carrying out the provisions of this resolution.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

In pursuance of the foregoing resolutions the Speaker announced the following committee: Representatives G. N. HAUGEN, C. A. KENNEDY, J. W. GOOD, S. F. PROUTY, C. E. PICKETT, N. E. KENDALL, F. P. WOODS, HORACE M. TOWNER, I. S. PEPPER, WILLIAM R. GREEN, JAMES T. LLOYD, C. R. DAVIS, I. L. LENROOT, C. O. LOBECK, and S. B. AYRES.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, June 5, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ALEXANDER, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 111) to convey the thanks of Congress to Capt. Arthur Henry Rostron, and through him to the officers and crew of the steamship Carpathia, of the Cunard Line, for the prompt and heroic service rendered by them in rescuing 704 lives from the wreck of the steamship Titanic in the North Atlantic Ocean, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 830), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BARNHART, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1248) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey a certain frame building, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 833), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GOEKE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 306) to provide for the award of medals of honor to the captain, officers, and crew of the Cunard steamship Carpathia, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 835), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CARLIN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 25002) to amend section 73 and section 76 of the act of August 27, 1894, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 831), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 6925) to authorize the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River near the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 834), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20102) relating to proof of signatures and handwriting, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 836), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Dak., favoring the enactment of legislation providing for a preliminary survey of those rivers, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CURTIS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Concordia, Kans., praying for the establishment of a department of public health, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 4355) incorporating the National Institute of Arts and Letters, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 846) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 4356) incorporating the National Academy of Arts and Letters, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 847) thereon.

RIGHT OF WAY AT SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 7002) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant to Salt Lake City, Utah, a right of way over certain public lands for reservoir purposes. As it is an emergency measure, I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SWANSON:

A bill (S. 7052) for the relief of Lawrence S. Babbitt and others (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SIMMONS:

A bill (S. 7053) for the relief of D. S. Barrus and I. H. Barrus; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GUGGENHEIM:

A bill (S. 7054) to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at La Junta, Colo. (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 7055) for the relief of Samuel J. Morgan (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 7056) for the relief of the city of Trinidad, Colo.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

A bill (S. 7057) granting an increase of pension to George W. Thompson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 7058) granting an increase of pension to Elias Redmon (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of Arizona:

A bill (S. 7059) to grant an honorable discharge to Charles T. Nutter; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RAYNER:

A bill (S. 7060) for the relief of Samuel H. Walker; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 7062) to amend section 55 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909; to the Committee on Patents.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RAYNER submitted an amendment relating to the refund of sums paid for documentary stamps, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—ELMER D. HACKETT.

On motion of Mr. GUGGENHEIM, it was Ordered, That there be withdrawn from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of Senate bill No. 703, Sixty-second Congress, first session, granting a pension to Elmer D. Hackett, there having been no adverse report thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JAMES COOPER.

On motion of Mr. GUGGENHEIM, it was Ordered, That there be withdrawn from the files of the Senate papers in the case of the bill S. 6157, Sixty-second Congress, second session, granting an increase of pension to James Cooper, there having been no adverse report thereon.

LANDING GUNS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 329), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate full information as to purchase, test, and use of landing guns in the Navy since March 1, 1909, together with a statement of appropriations made by Congress for this purpose and expenditures thereunder. Also any recommendations as to the continued use of said landing guns in the Navy.

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES (S. DOC. NO. 787.)

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask to have printed as a public document a paper by Hannis Taylor, explanatory of the authorship of the Constitution of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor will be entered.

WORLD PEACE (S. DOC. NO. 764).

Mr. WARREN. I have an address of less than 15 pages by a distinguished citizen of my State, William C. Deming, the editor of the Wyoming Tribune, delivered before the late Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration, May 17, 1912, on the opportunity and duty of the press in relation to world peace. I ask that the paper be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor will be entered.

PARCEL POST.

Mr. MYERS. Senate Document No. 490 is an address on the parcel post and postal-express situation in Congress by the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER]. I think it is a very valuable document, shedding much light upon the subject of which it treats. I understand there is great demand for it. I ask unanimous consent for an order to have 10,000 extra copies printed.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not positive as to the particular document the Senator speaks of, but I think we have already ordered some ten or twenty thousand copies, and if the $500 limit has been reached there would have to be a resolution offered and passed by the Senate. If the Senator from Montana will withhold the request I will gladly find out in a very few minutes whether the limit has been reached or not. If not, the committee can give the order.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the request be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The request was reduced to writing and referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows (S. Res. 330):

Resolved, That 10,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 490, Sixty-second Congress, second session, "The parcel-post and postal-express situation in Congress," be printed for the use of the Senate Document Room.

MORAL EDUCATION (S. DOC. NO. 763).

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a brief paper, being a report of the committee on moral education of the High School Teachers' Association of the District of Columbia. I ask that the paper be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor will be entered.

THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to give notice that on Saturday, June 8, immediately following the routine morning business, I will address the Senate in advocacy of an increase of the United States Navy.

GOOSE CREEK BRIDGE, SOUTH CAROLINA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6848) authorizing the Cooper River Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of South Carolina, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Goose Creek in Berkeley County, S. C., which was, on page 1, line 9, after "South Carolina," to insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND FOR STREET PURPOSES IN PORTLAND, OREG.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5910) granting to the city of Portland, Oreg., certain strips of land from the post-office and customhouse sites in said city for street purposes, which were, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "of"; and on page 2, line 2, to strike out "of" where it first occurs.

Mr. BOURNE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

SUPPORT AND MAINTENANCE OF BASTARDS.

Mr. DILLINGHAM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13041) to provide for the support and maintenance of bastards in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the words inserted by said amendment of the Senate insert the following: "upon such preliminary examination"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the words inserted by said amendment of the Senate insert the following: "who is quick with child"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 4, and agree to an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "after becoming quick with child"; and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the words stricken out after the word "examination" insert as follows: "If the woman be quick with child, or the child having been born and still under 2 years of age"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the word "pregnant," in said amendment of the Senate, insert the words "quick with child"; and the Senate agree to the same.

WILLIAM P. DILLINGHAM, CHARLES CURTIS,
ATLEE POMERENE,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.

BEN JOHNSON,
J. A. M. ADAIR,
L. C. DYER,
Conferees on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9061) limiting the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States, or for any Territory, or for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 5428. An act to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," approved February 19, 1909; and

S. J. Res. 97. Joint resolution authorizing the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography to occupy temporary structures erected by the American Red Cross and to erect temporary structures in Potomac Park, Washington, D. C.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I ask that Senate bill No. 3, known as the vocational education bill, be laid before the Senate for the purpose of discussion only.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	McCumber	Smith, Md.
Bacon	du Pont	McLean	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Smoot
Bradley	Foster	Martine, N. J.	Stephenson
Briggs	Gallinger	Myers	Stone
Bristow	Gardner	Nelson	Sutherland
Brown	Gronna	Newlands	Swanson
Bryan	Guggenheim	Oliver	Thornton
Burnham	Heyburn	Overman	Tillman
Burton	Hitchcock	Page	Townsend
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Perkins	Warren
Clapp	Johnston, Ala.	Richardson	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Root	Williams
Crawford	Kern	Shively	Works
Cullom	Lippitt	Simmons
Cummins	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.
Curtis	Lorimer	Smith, Ga.

Mr. JONES. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber on important business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. I had intended on yesterday to bring up Senate resolution 315 at this hour as a matter of the highest privilege, but my friend the Senator from Vermont having given notice that he would like to address the Senate at this time on a subject very near to his heart, I have waived that right and yield to him, of course. I will commence the conclusion of my remarks on the subject debated yesterday upon the close of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays Senate bill 3 before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. A bill reported by Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, February 26, 1912, the bill (S. 3) to cooperate with the States in encouraging instruction in agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in secondary schools; in maintaining instruction in these vocational subjects in State normal schools; in maintaining extension departments in State colleges of agriculture and mechanic arts; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I approach the discussion of this vocational-education bill with many misgivings and doubts as to the course I should pursue.

I am not unmindful of the limited time which Senators have to spare from the consideration of other important problems now being considered by Congress, and I would be especially considerate of their wishes that I condense what I have to say to the minimum.

On the other hand, here is a bill the importance of which has grown upon me until I feel that Senators should have a fairly good idea of what it purposes to accomplish.

Mr. President, this is a great public question; a question which affects the welfare not only of our boys and girls but of the mature vocational workers, including the home makers of the United States, as has no other which has been before Congress for more than half a century; a question which is engaging the best thought of eminent publicists and educators from one end of the country to the other—indeed, throughout the civilized world. It is a question which the American people have come to believe directly affects the economic conditions of the country in a degree little, if any, less than the largest of our large economic problems. It is a question which will, in my judgment, settle in great measure the quality of our citizenship in the generation upon which we are now entering. It is a question which will profoundly affect the cost of our food supply as well as the amount which our workers may earn with which to meet that higher cost of living which is upon us. It is a question which involves appropriations from the National Treasury aggregating nearly $15,000,000 annually. On a problem of this magnitude I believe Senators should not be heard to say that they are too busy with their other duties to give the matter proper consideration.

They will find on returning home that the question of vocational education is the subject of sermons in churches; of earnest discussions in granges and other farmers' associations; that it is regarded as a burning and vital question among labor organizations and manufacturing, and trades associations; and is, of course, the subject of special consideration among those connected with our institutions of learning everywhere, from the elementary schools up to the universities, from one end of our country to the other.

Mr. President, I believe this is one of the most important measures before this Congress, and so believing I am sure Senators will forgive me for urging upon them something more than a perfunctory examination of its provisions.

I therefore purpose to take up the more important—the appropriating—sections of the measure, and explain in detail their different provisions and why they have been incorporated in the bill; and I shall esteem it a special favor to have Senators interrupt me as I proceed whenever I fail to make the purpose and meaning of any section clear or whenever any Senator thinks he sees in any of its provisions points which he believes are subject to proper criticism.

In this connection, perhaps I should say that at the proper time I shall, by direction of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, move that a substitute bill take the place of Senate bill No. 3, as originally reported to the Senate from the committee, and my remarks at this time will be predicated upon the substitute measure.

The title of the bill is comprehensive and states in general terms what it seeks to accomplish. I read:

> To provide for cooperation with the States in promoting instruction in agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in secondary schools; in preparing teachers for these vocational subjects in State colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts in State normal schools, and in other training schools for teachers supported and controlled by the public; in maintaining extension departments of State colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts; in maintaining branches of State experiment stations; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure.

Mr. President, I am sure it will aid Senators in forming their conclusions as to the merits of the bill to give a brief statement of the facts concerning its genesis. It was introduced in the Senate on the 6th day of April, 1911, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Near the close of the session it was taken up by that committee. A brief consideration made it evident that its administrative features would probably need amendment in order to better articulate with the laws of the several States. Having this fact in mind Senator CRAWFORD introduced and, with a single dissenting vote, the committee passed the following resolution:

> Resolved, That Senator PAGE, as a subcommittee of one, be instructed to correspond with leading educators and others interested in the purposes of the proposed measure, and to report to the full committee the result of his investigation, and to submit a bill amended to conform to the suggestions he may receive from such correspondence or any he might have to make. And that the committee approves the general purposes of the bill.

In conformity with these resolutions, letters were written by me to the State superintendents of public instruction in every State inviting a careful examination and criticism of the bill and requesting such suggestions as to amendments as would, in their judgment, perfect the bill and make it articulate with the school laws and school conditions of their respective States.

Letters were also written to a large number of other prominent educators in every section of the Union, inclosing a copy of the bill and asking their advice as to amendments which would perfect or improve the measure.

The response to these letters was quite general. In a very large majority of the replies the indorsement of the measure was unqualified and pronounced. Wherever local conditions seemed to demand amendments they were suggested, and only from a very few States were replies received which indicated disapproval of the general purposes of the bill.

Letters asking for suggestions of amendments were also addressed to the governors of the several States, to the heads of State agricultural colleges, and to men of known prominence in educational affairs in the various walks of life, including editors of newspapers devoted to agriculture, the trades and industries, and home making.

Replies were received from every State in the Union. With less than a half dozen exceptions, the replies received from State superintendents of public instruction and State boards of education were favorable—most of them enthusiastically so. A few were qualifiedly favorable, but suggested changes in the administrative features or in some of the less important details. Only two were unqualifiedly opposed to the bill.

Mr. President, I have devoted more than four solid months of diligent labor to this bill; yet I realize, after all, that personally I have contributed only a small part to the present movement to broaden out our school system by the addition of education for the basic vocations on the farm, in the shop, and in the home; and I should be guilty of great ingratitude if I failed to ascribe to my colaborers a large share of credit for formulating and perfecting the measure.

While I have had the assistance of a large number of educators throughout the country, it is due to Dr. P. P. Claxton, our present efficient Commissioner of Education; to Dr. Charles A. Prosser, the executive secretary of the National Association for the Promotion of Vocational Education; and to Hon. Willet M. Hays, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, to say that they have given to this work an immense amount of expert advice and assistance; and without their aid I fear my own part would have proven heavier than I could carry.

Unless they have given the matter very careful study, I presume few Senators know the extent to which the general subject of vocational education is being discussed by the people of this country. It is not, as many seem to believe, a new question, with no part yet ready to be crystallized into law. The present bill is a consensus of opinion far more unanimous than is the case with most portions of our constructive legislation.

In 1862 Justin S. Morrill, then a Representative from the State of Vermont, believing that the welfare of the country demanded special education along the lines of agriculture and the mechanic arts, introduced what has been since known as the Morrill agricultural college bill. That it was a measure pregnant with immense importance to the coming generations is now everywhere conceded.

The Morrill bill has given the country a class of high-grade agricultural and mechanical colleges, from which have been graduated men qualified to take up specialized work along agricultural and industrial lines, the value of which, from an economic standpoint, it would to-day be difficult to overestimate; and these institutions have also developed strong educational courses relating to home making.

But could Senator Morrill, wise as he was in his day and generation, have lived until to-day and observed the working out of his great educational measure, he would have been compelled to confess that in one very important particular it had failed to give the results which were expected to flow therefrom.

Senator Morrill believed, as did those who labored with him at that time, that the passage of the Morrill bill would give an immense impetus to development in rural affairs; that his bill would result in furnishing the country with a great army of trained farmers, men who would return from the college to the farm and invigorate farm life with new power and improved farm methods. As a matter of fact these colleges have found their peculiar function to be to prepare technicians in agriculture, the mechanic arts, and in home economics. The experience of this and other countries has fully demonstrated that the vocational education of youth for the business of farming and for the expert work in the trades and industries, and also for efficient home making, must be provided for in high schools, and, as a matter of fact, the Morrill Act has proven to be the beginning, the making of the preliminary preparations, for really carrying vocational education to the masses of our people.

No one questions the great value of the work done by our agricultural colleges and by the experiment stations later added thereto; but the fact still remains that as a place where the average boy on the farm could find a school which would equip him for farm life and send him back to the farm imbued with that enthusiasm for agriculture, the Morrill Act has not fulfilled the full expectations of its author.

The important question now pressing for solution in this country is, What can be done to change this condition and stem the tide now so strongly running from country to city and, at the same time, prepare our city boys for their work in the non-agricultural vocations and bring the full force of modern science to bear on the making of our homes and the rearing of our children?

That something is very badly needed to supplement the Morrill bill is universally conceded, and it is to the satisfying of this great need that this bill is in large part directed. It attempts to provide a plan for taking the knowledge which these agricultural colleges have developed to all the workers who need this knowledge; and since the task is so vast, and since the Nation, through the Morrill Act, inaugurated this work, this bill proposes that the Nation shall cooperate with the States in carrying the benefits to all the people.

With this statement as to the general purposes of the bill, I shall, without further preliminaries, proceed to give the Senate a full and careful analysis of what it is, what it appropriates, what it contemplates, and how it so safeguards the moneys which are to be distributed to the several States that they may not be diverted to purposes other than those contemplated by the measure.

Let me repeat that I hope no Senator interested in this measure—and I can not believe that there is any Senator who is not—will hesitate to interrogate me with perfect freedom, not only whenever any feature of the bill seems to be the proper subject of criticism, but whenever a provision is not fully and clearly understood. If any Senator does not have the bill before him I shall be pleased to furnish a copy that he may, if he desire, follow me as I proceed to take up, clause by clause, the different sections of the measure.

Mr. President, I wish as I proceed to make clear to Senators the fact that this bill designs to take from the Federal Treasury only such sums for initial expenditures as will stimulate and encourage the several States to go on with the great vocational-education work contemplated by the bill, leaving the chief burden to be borne by the States themselves.

Experience with similar laws has shown that a very small expenditure from the Federal Treasury for the cause of education has resulted in stimulating a very large outlay on the part of the States.

In a hearing before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate Dr. Howard Edwards, president of the Rhode Island State College, stated that throughout the entire United States the average appropriations made by the several States was fourteen times the amount appropriated by the Federal Government under the Morrill and supplementary acts. Indeed, Dr. W. O. Thompson, president of the National Association of Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations and president of the Ohio State University, made a statement before the committee that in the State of Ohio the appropriations made for educational work to supplement those made by the Federal Government under the Morrill Act and acts supplementary thereto were forty times the amount appropriated by the Federal Government.

While there is no basis for a definite statement as to what extent the States will supplement the funds appropriated by this act, it is believed that within a very few years they will amount to several times the sum of the Federal appropriations made by this bill. So I say, Mr. President, this bill is simply an offer to cooperate with the States in this greatly needed improvement in our school system. It is designed to encourage, to stimulate, to inspire the States to take up and extend their work along the vocational-education lines contemplated by this bill.

Too much stress can not be laid upon the fact that this bill would form but a very small additional amount for the support of the schools of the United States, large as its appropriations may at first seem to be. The expense of schools in this country is, in round numbers, about $500,000,000 per year. The entire appropriations that will be called for by this bill in 1921, when the maximum sum has been reached, will be less than 3 per cent of this sum.

There can be little doubt, Mr. President, that, with the wise counsel and assistance of the Federal Commissioner of Education in standardizing vocational systems and arranging, with the cooperation and advice of the educational boards of the respective States, a wise curriculum, we shall give an impetus to this much-neglected work of vocational education which will enable it to move forward with that vigor and effectiveness which would be absolutely impossible under 48 movements in no way coordinated.

This bill proceeds upon the theory demonstrated by the Morrill land grant college act of 1862, and the acts supplemental thereto, that by cooperation between the Federal Government and the States, and among the States, vocational education is at once put forward with more of economy, and earlier attains its very important results in all parts of the Nation. The Nation wants results at the earliest possible date. It wants a more abundant supply of farm products, more highly skilled workers in the trades and industries, and more efficient makers of the homes of the people; and it wants the highest civilization which comes with a school system made more efficient in general studies, and so broadened out as to include education in the vocations of the many who will not enter the professions.

Mr. President, I should be very glad if it were practicable to have the entire bill read at this time, but I am not unmindful of the fact that Senators are sorely pressed for time, and that many of them probably could not conveniently listen to the full reading of the measure. To make it possible, therefore, for Senators to secure in the smallest possible time a fairly good understanding of the bill, I have prepared an abstract or synopsis of it. As the bill is being read I hope Senators will feel entirely free to interject interrogatories whenever they desire additional information about any section or wish to have the section read in full.

APPROPRIATIONS.

Section 1 gives a definition or construction to the several descriptive terms used in specifying the classes of institutions which are to receive the benefits of the several appropriations under this act.

Section 2 is a general clause making the appropriation and stating that the sums designated in sections 3 to 10, inclusive, are "for instruction in agriculture, the trades, and industries, and home economics, for agricultural tests and demonstrations, and for administrative purposes."

Section 3 provides $3,000,000 for what is denominated in the bill the "secondary school department fund." This appropriation is for instruction in agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in clearly defined departments or divisions of existing high schools of secondary school grade. It provides that this appropriation shall begin with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and is allotted to the several States and the District of Columbia on the basis of population.

It is estimated that about 15,000 communities outside the large cities will take advantage of this appropriation, or an average of 300, or a little more, for each State. Unquestionably the number will increase from year to year, and for the first few years there may be less than this number; but upon the hypothesis that this number of communities will avail themselves of the provisions of this section of this bill, it would mean that the Federal Government will contribute toward each of these schools $200. If the State should supplement this Federal fund with a like fund, it would mean, of course, $400 that each rural community would be benefited through the joint State and national appropriation.

If, as is expected will be the case, the rural community is asked to match the joint State and Federal appropriation, it means that each rural community will have a separate unit, room, or division of its school work at each high school, which will be presided over by a teacher costing, say, $800 per year.

The bill provides that the money shall be distributed, unless otherwise provided, according to the amount which the local community shall raise for the same purpose, although it wisely preserves the autonomy of the States by providing that if any State thinks it best to distribute the fund upon some other basis it can do so; always conditioned, however, that the method of distribution be approved by the Department of the Interior, which, of course, in this case means the Commissioner of Education.

It should be said, however, that under the terms of the bill, the State and local communities would be jointly compelled to contribute only twice as much as the Federal appropriation; but educators believe that the example set by States like New Jersey and Massachusetts—which have worked out this problem upon the basis of a contribution by the local community equal to the amount of the outside help they receive—will be the method followed in the distribution of this fund. The average appropriation to each State and the District of Columbia under the provisions of this section is $61,225.

Section 4 provides $3,000,000 for what is known as the "industrial or home-economics school fund." This appropriation is for the maintenance of instruction in the trades and industries and home economics in separate industrial or home-economic schools of secondary grade. The difference between this appropriation and the appropriation for what is designated as the "secondary-school department fund" is that the latter contemplates assistance to the separate divisions or departments devoted to vocational education in the high schools in the larger villages and towns, while the appropriation in section 4 is presumably to be used for separate schools at industrial centers or in cities large enough to maintain independent schools for the trades and industries. This appropriation also does not begin until the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and is allotted to the different States and the District of Columbia in proportion to their "population engaged in trades and transportation, and in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits."

The question may be asked why the allotment is so made. The answer is that in taking the Federal census the population is divided under certain subheads, two of which are "Persons engaged in trades and transportation" and "Persons engaged in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits." The language of this section is, therefore, made to conform to the language of those census subdivisions which every 10 years records those who work in the trades and industries. The average appropriation to the different States and the District of Columbia under the provisions of this section is $61,225.

With reference to the appropriation referred to in this section, it may also be said that it is estimated that 30 per cent of the population of this country will be able to take advantage of its benefits; and if, as is expected, our population reaches 100,000,000 by 1916, when this appropriation becomes available, it means that $3,000,000 will be distributed to 30,000,000 people, which would be 10 cents per capita.

Let us, to illustrate, take a city of 10,000 population and see what kind of school would naturally result from this appropriation. Ten thousand population, at 10 cents per capita, would mean that the Federal contribution would be $1,000. If the State should match this by an appropriation of a like amount, and if, as it is supposed will be the case, the town or city shall match the joint Federal and State appropriation, it would mean that the city must raise $2,000 to match the $2,000 contributed by the State and Federal Governments.

In other words, it would give them a $4,000 school, devoted to instruction in the trades and industries and home economics. A city of 100,000 population would have $40,000 to devote to this class of education. A city of 1,000,000 would have $400,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PAGE. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the Senator whether the Federal appropriation is contingent upon the State and local appropriations?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, the Federal appropriation is contingent upon an appropriation from the State and the local communities of at least twice the amount of the Federal appropriation.

Mr. GALLINGER. And unless the State and the local communities make that appropriation, the Federal appropriation will not be called for?

Mr. PAGE. That is correct.

Section 5 appropriates $3,000,000 for what is designated as the "district agricultural high-school fund." This appropriation is for the maintenance of instruction in agriculture and home economics in the district agricultural high schools to be established under the provisions of this act. This appropriation also begins with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and is allotted to the several States in proportion to the number of persons engaged in agricultural pursuits as shown by the preceding Federal census. It provides a special appropriation of $5,000 for each State with less than 100,000 people engaged in agriculture. The average appropriation for each State under the provisions of this section, basing the estimate upon the census of 1900—I have not the figures under the census of 1910—would be $65,000.

Section 6 appropriates $1,000,000 for what is designated as the "branch station fund." This appropriation is for the maintenance of branch or demonstration stations upon farms connected with the district agricultural high schools established under the provisions of section 5. This fund is designed to give these large agricultural high schools, one of which will be in each group of 8 or 10 counties, a practical turn. Here the teachers and pupils will live on a large farm, and much of the practical work will be done by the students. Here experimenters will test and breed plants and animals especially adapted to the conditions of the surrounding counties. Here the matter of rotation schemes needed by the region will be under test, and the use of fertilizers on the local soils will be studied.

Here the college and department extension workers will center such of their work as is needed by the students. Here the students will gain a knowledge of research work, that those gifted in this form of public service may be drawn into this important work. This appropriation begins with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and is allotted to the several States in proportion to the number of persons engaged in agricultural pursuits. It makes a special appropriation of $2,000 for States having a population of less than 100,000 people engaged in agriculture. The average appropriation to each State under the provisions of this bill is $21,833.

Touching the $4,000,000 appropriated for this district agricultural high-school fund and the branch-station fund it will probably work about as follows:

It is estimated that there will be about 1 school for whites in each congressional district outside of the cities, or about 325 in all. If in the Southern States there shall be 75 additional schools established for the colored race, it will give us a total of 400 schools. The fund to be divided to each of these schools will be substantially as follows:

First, the Government appropriates $3,000,000 under section 5; the State must appropriate the other $6,000,000; the Federal Government appropriates $1,000,000 for the branch stations connected with these schools under section 6; and to this sum another $1,000,000 must be added by the State, making a total of $11,000,000 to be divided among 400 schools, or $27,500 for each school, including the State and Federal appropriations.

Men experienced in the management of schools of this kind say it will cost about $100 for each pupil to conduct such a really good school as is contemplated by this act. If this supposition be correct, it means that every year there will be turned out from these different agricultural schools 275 boys and girls who, it is hoped, will return to the farm to join with the father—who, meanwhile, has been educated under the provisions of section 7 of this bill, which provides for college extension and farm demonstration work—in vitalizing, energizing, and stimulating a more intelligent and more profitable management of the farm.

Section 7 appropriates $3,000,000 for what is designated as the "extension-work fund," being for the support at each State college of agriculture and the mechanic arts of an extension department or division to enable the several State colleges of agriculture to take to the adult farmer upon the farm in his own locality the accumulated results of experimentation and research at the agricultural colleges and experiment stations and at the departments of agriculture; and is designed to further the work of teaching and demonstrating in a practical way to persons not in the schools how actual farming can be conducted with more profitable results than at present. This appropriation begins with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, the appropriation for that year being $480,000, or $10,000 for each of the 48 States. This sum is increased from year to year until 1921, when it reaches the maximum sum of $2,980,000. All sums, aside from the $10,000 per year to each State, are to be allotted on the basis of population engaged in agricultural pursuits. The average sum to each State in 1921 and thereafter is $62,083.

Section 8 appropriates $480,000 for what is designated as the "college teachers' training fund." This appropriation is for the preparation of teachers in departments or divisions of education in the State colleges of agriculture and mechanic arts of the respective States, to give instruction in, or closely related to, agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics. I wish to make it plain that this measure not only provides the means for the employment of teachers in the school service and in college-extension service but also the means with which these teachers may be trained by the agricultural colleges and State normal and other teachers' training schools. It begins with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and allots $10,000 to each of the 48 States.

Mr. President, this appropriation was not called for by the original bill, and perhaps it is due to the Senate that I explain why it has been added.

In December last the Southern Commercial Congress, an organization having for its special object the promotion of the welfare of the South, held a meeting here in Washington for the purpose of discussing vocational education generally, and especially with reference to its effect upon the Southern States. Upon its invitation, the executive committee of the American Association of Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations attended in a body and assisted in the discussion and amendment of this bill. This meeting was presided over by the senior Senator from Florida, Mr. FLETCHER, and was attended by a large number of leading educators from all parts of the country, the session lasting for three days. A subcommittee took up the bill line by line and section by section. Such features as were deemed objectionable were eliminated, amendments were introduced wherever it was believed they would improve the measure, and after the bill was finally perfected and completed, the following resolution was unanimously adopted—I read this because it shows the unanimity with which they reached their conclusion:

Resolved, That the conference of friends of vocational education assembled in Washington December 14, 15, and 16, 1911, select a committee on ways and means, whose duty it shall be to further the interests of the Page bill, Senate bill 3, and to work for its successful passage.

This subcommittee to revise the bill was composed of men of national reputation on educational matters, and was as follows:

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, United States Senator, chairman; Dr. P. P. Claxton, United States Commissioner of Education—he is our new Commissioner of Education from the South—Dr. W. O. Thompson, president Ohio State University; Dean H. L. Russell, of the University of Wisconsin; Hon. Willet M. Hays, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture; Mr. G. G. Dawe, managing director of the Southern Commercial Congress; and Dr. J. H. Connell, president of the Oklahoma State Agricultural and Mechanical College.

The question of the unpreparedness of the country to take up this work was one of the leading topics of discussion at this meeting, and the conclusion reached was that we must add another half million dollars to the appropriation for the education of teachers by agricultural and mechanical colleges and that we should put off the time when the main features of the appropriation should become available till the year ending June 30, 1916.

This change not only gives the several States sufficient time to prepare for the education of teachers, but it gives them ample opportunity to enact any legislation which may seem to be necessary to make the State laws harmonize with the national law; and it hardly need be said that if during the next three years it should be found that any minor changes not affecting the fundamental principles of the bill are desirable, the National Congress will be quick to make those changes.

Section 9 appropriates $1,000,000 for what is known as the "normal teachers' training fund," being for the preparation of teachers to give instruction in, or closely related to, agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in State normal schools and in other training schools for teachers.

This appropriation begins with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, that the preparation of teachers may begin at once, and is allotted to the several States and the District of Columbia in proportion to population. It makes a special appropriation of $3,000 to each of the States having a population of less than 300,000. The average appropriation to each State under the provisions of this section is $21,333.

Section 10 appropriates $90,000 for what is designated as the "administration fund." This appropriation is subdivided as follows: Forty thousand dollars to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior in paying the necessary expenses of administering the provisions of this act relating to schools of secondary grade and to the preparation of teachers in agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics; $35,000 to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture, of which $20,000 is for administering the provisions of the act relating to extension departments or divisions and branch stations, $15,000 to enable him to cooperate with the Secretary of the Interior in relation to schools of secondary grade giving instruction in agriculture and home economics and to the preparation of teachers in these vocations; and $15,000 to be expended by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor in paying the expenses of administering, in cooperation with the Secretary of the Interior, those provisions of the act relating to instruction in the trades and industries and in the preparation of teachers for these vocations. These appropriations begin with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

To summarize, let me say that in 1921, when the maximum shall have been reached, the appropriations will aggregate $14,752,000, as follows:

For the teaching of agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics, in connection with our general secondary or public high-school system	$3,000,000
For the teaching of the trades and industries and home economics in separate schools	3,000,000
For instruction in agriculture and home economics in State district agricultural schools	3,125,000
For agricultural extension work	2,980,000
For branch experiment and demonstration stations at district agricultural schools	1,050,000
For the education of teachers at State normal and other training schools	1,027,000
For the education of teachers at State agricultural colleges	480,000
For administration expenses	90,000
Total	14,752,000

I have had prepared a tabulated statement showing the exact amount appropriated by this bill from 1913 to 1921, inclusive, and ask leave that it may be included in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. It shows the appropriations for each particular feature of the bill in detail and in the aggregate for each year. The appropriations increase from 1913 to 1921 as follows:

1913	$2,077,000
1915	2,777,000
1916	13,252,000
1917	13,552,000
1918	13,852,000
1919	14,152,000
1920	14,452,000
1921	14,752,000

The statement referred to follows.

Funds required annually under Senate bill No. 3, 1913 to 1921, and permanently.

NOTE.—The figures in italic indicate increases of appropriations, as explained by footnotes below.

[2] According to Twelfth Census, 9 States had less than 300,000 total population.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PAGE. Yes.

Mr. JONES. The Senator has passed section 9?

Mr. PAGE. I have. I will be very glad to answer any question, however, relating to that section.

Mr. JONES. In section 9, on page 8, I notice the provision is for the preparation of teachers "in State normal schools and in other training schools for teachers." In our State university, for instance, which is a very large educational institution, they give special training to teachers, although it is not termed, of course, a training school; it is a State university. I would like to know whether, in the opinion of the Senator, that university would come under the provisions of this section?

Mr. PAGE. I am happy to say that that matter was very carefully discussed, and the decision reached was that any school which the State board for vocational education regarded as a training school for teachers might properly be included within the provisions of the section.

Mr. JONES. Would the Senator have any objection to striking out, in line 2, the word "training," before the word "schools," and inserting after the word "schools" the words "furnishing special training for teachers," so as to make it read:

That for the preparation of teachers to give instruction in or closely related to agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in State normal schools and in other schools furnishing special training for teachers.

And so forth.

Mr. PAGE. I can not see any objection to doing so.

Mr. JONES. I hope the Senator will consider that suggestion when the bill comes up. I think that would make it clearer than the language of the section as it now stands. I have some doubt whether under the language of the section our State university would come under the terms of the bill.

Mr. PAGE. If the Senator will study the bill in its entirety he will find, as he goes through it, that we have made a good many provisions conditioned upon the approval of the State board of control or board for vocational education, and conditioned further upon securing the assent of the Department of the Interior, which means the Commissioner of Education. There is no design on the part of those interested in the bill to deprive any State of the right to determine what are training schools for teachers.

Mr. JONES. That is true; and yet when the bill confines it to certain described schools, no matter what may be the provision thereafter, it is confined to those schools. I doubt if the language, "training schools for teachers" would include the State university, which is not classed as a training school for teachers. Therefore I wanted to suggest this change in the language for the Senator's future consideration.

Mr. PAGE. I certainly see no objection to it now. I will give it consideration and report to the Senator later.

I would especially direct the attention of the Senate to the fact that every section of this bill has been carefully considered and every safeguard provided to prevent the diversion of any fund from the purpose for which the appropriation has been made. I am sure Senators can have but a slight appreciation of the details which have been wrought out in this bill. First, to the end that its provisions might articulate satisfactorily with State laws; and, second, that the funds appropriated by the measure may never be diverted, lost, or squandered.

Mr. President, I have prepared with considerable care a statement showing in detail the administrative features of the bill, and I am prepared to go on at length and explain fully how the law is to be administered, how the appropriations are to be safeguarded, and what is required of the several States in order that they may participate in these appropriations.

As I proceed to the discussion of this measure, I will refer briefly to a few of the more important sections covering the administrative features of the bill.

ADMINISTRATION.

Section 11 safeguards the funds appropriated for schools of the secondary grade and the preparation of teachers for these schools. It charges the Secretary of the Interior with the duty, and gives him the necessary power, to administer the provisions of this act in relation to the $9,000,000 appropriated for schools teaching the trades and industries, home economics, and agriculture, as provided for in sections 3, 4, and 5 of this act; the $480,000 for the education of teachers in State agricultural colleges, as provided in section 8; and the $1,000,000 appropriated for the education of teachers in State normal and other training schools, as provided in section 9. Section 11 also provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall have the cooperation of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

Section 12 safeguards the other $4,000,000 appropriated in sections 6 and 7. It charges the Secretary of Agriculture with the duty, and to him is given the power, to administer the provisions of the act relating to the $1,000,000 appropriated for branch stations at the district agricultural high schools, and the $3,000,000 appropriated for the extension-work fund, and it authorizes him to aid the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out the provisions of this act, so far as they relate to instruction in agriculture and home economics in schools of the secondary grade, and the preparation of teachers for those vocations.

Section 13 gives the Secretary of Commerce and Labor authority to assist the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out those provisions of the act which relate to instruction in the trades and industries and the preparation of teachers for those vocations.

The question may be asked as to why the administration of this act has not been left with a single department. The answer is that, after a careful study of the matter, and after conferring with those whom I think best qualified by experience to advise concerning the administrative features of the bill, I have become satisfied that, so far as they apply to supervision of the extension work in agriculture and to the branch-station work provided for in the bill, they may best be left to the Department of Agriculture to administer. On the other hand, supervision of the schools provided for by the bill may be left to the Commissioner of Education, who will, of course, be the direct representative of the Secretary of the Interior in administering that part of the act which it is made the duty of that official to administer.

As to the position occupied by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor with reference to this bill, it may be said that the labor organizations have come to regard that official as the connecting link between the Government and themselves, and as the Department of Agriculture has long been the special agency in touch with agricultural and home-makers' organizations, they have asked that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor might be vested with a cooperative relation in connection with those schools which are to teach the trades and industries. It has therefore seemed eminently wise that the Departments of Agriculture and of Commerce and Labor be authorized to give cooperative assistance to the Department of the Interior and thus help the Bureau of Education to have the widest possible support.

Section 14 provides that in order that any State may secure the benefits of this act it shall, through the legislative authority of said State, accept its provisions and shall designate a State custodian to receive and be responsible for each and all of the seven funds appropriated. I would call the attention of Senators especially to the last paragraph of this section, for in many respects it contains one of the most important changes made in the bill as originally introduced. It reads as follows:

Any State or the District of Columbia may accept the benefit of any one or more of the respective funds herein appropriated to it and may defer the acceptance of the benefit of any one or more of such funds, and shall be required to meet only the conditions imposed in relation to those funds the benefit of which it has accepted.

This paragraph has been incorporated in the bill at the suggestion of several States which were in doubt as to whether they would or would not deem it advisable to accept all the appropriations and provisions of the bill, as they were required to do under the measure as it was originally drawn, in order to be the recipients of any of the appropriations named in the measure.

The effect of this amendment is to leave it optional with any State to accept any one or all of the appropriations and to permit it to defer the acceptance of any one or more of its provisions until such time as the State may wish to avail itself of the benefits of those particular provisions.

My judgment is that, without a single exception, every State will avail itself of every provision of the bill. Inasmuch as the $3,000,000 appropriation for each of the three classes of secondary schools—$9,000,000 in all—and only a part of the appropriation for college extension work becomes effective until 1916, all the States will be given ample opportunity to provide by legislative enactment for taking advantage of the provisions of the bill.

I confess in this respect I may be mistaken. My good friend the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] expresses a doubt of his own State accepting all the provisions of the measure. I believe that within five years every State will not only be accepting the provisions and appropriating enough to cover its provisions but a good deal more. But, of course, that is a matter of opinion.

I believe there is no State in which there will not be a meeting of the legislature by 1916.

Section 15 provides that States must, by legislative enactment, designate a "board of vocational education," which shall have all necessary power to cooperate with the Secretary of the Interior in the administration of the provisions of the act relating to the industrial schools authorized by the act and the training of teachers. This board may consist either of the board of education or other body now having charge of the administration of public education in the several States, or it may be a new board to be established with special reference to the new educational system which this legislation will initiate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PAGE. With pleasure.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest to the Senator that some States have constitutional provisions covering the organization and government of the public schools and it would seem that it might be necessary to change the constitutional provisions in order to authorize the creation of the board. I have the constitution of one State before me where it makes a provision definite as to the constitution of the educational board.

I understand the Senator to say that the States will be required to create a new board, because it would be in effect a new board. In that case you would have to change the constitution of the State.

Mr. PAGE. That condition has been suggested in regard to one or more of the States. As I think the matter will work out, your State legislature will make the board authorized by your constitution the vocational education board to take charge of this field.

Mr. HEYBURN. The State legislature would not have power to legislate away the provisions of the constitution or to change it. It could not be done except by a change of the constitution itself. The legislature was not invested with power in this case to make any change whatever. It was thought dangerous to leave that to the legislature, because it would be subject to the vicissitudes of changing administrations and changing opinions. So in making the constitution we fixed it so definitely as that the legislature would not have control over it. Now, it might be desirable to have such a board as is suggested in the bill, but it would be beyond the power of the legislature to create it.

Mr. PAGE. No; not at all. Can the Senator tell me whether that board as authorized by his State constitution is made up of one, two, or three members?

Mr. HEYBURN. The board consists of the superintendent of public instruction, the secretary of state, and the attorney general.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator further if he can see any objection, in view of your constitution, to saying that the board authorized by the constitution shall be the board which shall have charge of this fund?

Mr. HEYBURN. In section 2 of article 9 there is this provision:

The general supervision of the public schools of the State—

And of course that would include the distribution of the money—shall be vested in a board of education, whose powers and duties shall be prescribed by law; the superintendent of public instruction, the secretary of state, and attorney general shall constitute the board, of which the superintendent of public instruction shall be president.

That gives a name to the board and provides for its make-up. We could not change that.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, this is not a new matter. It has been discussed by educators to quite an extent. I submit to the Senator that a simple enactment by the Legislature of Idaho, making this board of education the board of vocational education called for by the bill, would give you the most perfect authority for handling this appropriation. If I am not right about this, I desire to have the Senator suggest some amendment. I think I am correct about it. Let me read it again:

This board may consist either of the board of education or other body now having charge of the administration of public education in the several States—

It seems to me that this is exactly the language necessary to meet the conditions in the Senator's State. Let me read it again for the benefit of the Senator:

This board may consist either of the board of education or other body now having charge of the administration of public education in the several States, or it may be a new board to be established with special reference to the new educational system which this legislation will initiate.

It may be a general State board dealing with these appropriations in their broader relations, delegating the details to existing State boards or departments in charge of educational matters, or it may be a State board in immediate charge of the schools. The idea has been to interfere as little as possible with any suitable machinery which the States may already have for carrying forward the work of their schools and to give entire freedom to them in making such changes in their plans for the administration of public education as they may desire.

There has been some little criticism of the proposal for a board of control or board for vocational education in the States, but I believe that where the matter has been explained to those who have written me letters of criticism, the objections have been removed.

I think in every case where I have taken up this matter with educators or with boards of education they have been fully satisfied with the provisions of this section as it now reads. Bear in mind that this is a provision made to meet just the exact conditions suggested by the Senator from Idaho.

In several of the States educational work is under the charge of a single head, usually designated the State superintendent of public instruction or State superintendent of education.

This bill makes it necessary that the board for vocational education shall be made up of at least three persons. But if a State desires to make no change in its present administrative machinery it can merely designate the governor and other officers as ex officio members of this board to work with the State superintendent of public instruction or other already constituted agencies.

Section 16 provides for the establishment of those district agricultural high schools for which section 5 of the bill appropriates $3,000,000. It provides that there shall be at least 1 school for each 15 counties, and that there shall not be more than 1 for each 5 counties or fraction thereof. This provision is designed to be so elastic that no State now having agricultural schools will have difficulty in adjusting these schools to the provisions of the bill; and yet it safeguards the measure by providing against the creation of a multiplicity of weak, inefficient one-county schools——

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I should like to ask the Senator a question. He states that the district shall be composed of not less than five counties.

Mr. PAGE. Of not less than five counties. Have you any of your schools predicated upon less than five counties in a district?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. We have a school for each congressional district, and one county alone has a population more than sufficient to furnish the apportionment for a Member of Congress.

Mr. PAGE. But you could attach to your largest city or your largest district some of the outlying counties.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. That is only one county, and we have so many people in that one county that it is more than enough to make one congressional district, and when you require in the bill five counties you cut out that district.

Mr. PAGE. It is not supposed that the city of New York has any farms within its limits, and therefore it will not be included. The provisions of the bill contemplate that the agricultural and the rural sections shall be benefited by this particular provision. Bear in mind that the important cities have separate schools, and we give to the rural districts their schools. The only reason why we say there shall be five counties in each district is that there shall not be a multiplicity of little one-county districts as in the State of Wisconsin. I think the Senator from Wisconsin will bear me witness that they have there a law which provides for a one-county school, and this bill, if we pass it, will meet that class of cases. If we should have a one-county school it would generally be so cheap a school that it would hardly come within the spirit of this act.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The Senator does not yet understand me. One county in my State has a population of 235,000. It is largely agricultural. There is a city in it, of course, but you would deprive that district from having any school at all.

Mr. PAGE. I do not so understand it. Take the city to which you refer and take four other counties outside of that county, and the five together will have one of these schools, and it will be a fine school. It need not be any less of a fine school because it is near a city. For instance, what is your largest town—Birmingham?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Birmingham.

Mr. PAGE. Birmingham would not have an agricultural school within its limits, but outside of Birmingham you would arrange a group of five counties, and they together would have the benefit of this act.

Mr. BACON. The word "district" does not mean a congressional district?

Mr. PAGE. Not at all, because if we had it by congressional districts we would work out a very impracticable scheme. The city of New York has lots of congressional districts. We do not design or expect that New York will have any of these schools in its limits.

Mr. BACON. We have in my State schools which are located in congressional districts. We have these agricultural schools, one in each congressional district, and I presume that would not interfere with the scheme of this bill.

Mr. PAGE. Not at all, because you have more than nine congressional districts.

Mr. BACON. We have 12.

Mr. PAGE. You have more than 60 counties?

Mr. BACON. Yes; 146.

Mr. PAGE. Very well. If you had 60 counties you would then have one for each congressional district, provided you saw fit to make a division of one for each five counties; but, having more than that, it is perfectly easy to arrange it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. PAGE. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. While our schools are under the old congressional district plan of 11, so far the policy has been to adhere to those old lines and not change them on account of the fact that we have had a new congressional district added, but even if that were different it would be quite easy, I think, to make the school districts such as to meet a compliance with the bill and to put five counties in a district.

Mr. PAGE. I want to say the State of Georgia has been fully considered in the working out of this measure, and, unless I am very much mistaken, there is no reason why the provisions of this bill will not work out according to the plan now existing in your State. We have had here from Georgia some very strong educators. Dr. Soule, of Georgia, was here. I think he is one of the ablest of the educators of the South.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, the Senator might change that from "the South" to "the United States or of any other country."

Mr. PAGE. I accept the amendment. I think well of the Senator's suggestion.

This provision is designed to be so elastic that no State now having agricultural schools will have difficulty in adjusting these schools to the provisions of the bill, and yet it safeguards the measure by providing against the creation of a multiplicity of weak, inefficient one-county schools, rather than a few strong, well-equipped institutions which shall serve practically as a vocational college for those millions of farmer boys who will find a high-school course fitted to their needs while the higher agricultural colleges organized under the Morrill Act will attract only tens of thousands.

This section also provides for separate agricultural schools for the negro race and prohibits any tuition charges.

Section 17 provides that no State shall be entitled to the benefits of the branch station fund until by legislative authority it shall have provided for a branch station in connection with district agricultural high schools, receiving funds under this act, and shall have provided as an appropriation for the annual maintenance of such branch stations a sum at least equal to that allotted annually under this act. The fund is safeguarded by the following clause:

The sum paid to each State for branch station shall be applied only to paying the necessary expenses of conducting, by such branch stations, field tests, plant breeding, and other scientific work bearing directly on the occupation of agriculture.

Section 18 provides that no State shall be entitled to any part of this allotment for college extension work until by legislative enactment it shall provide for an extension department in its State College of Agriculture, and shall have provided as an appropriation for that work an amount at least equal to the amount annually allotted to the State from the Federal Treasury.

Section 19 is one of the most important of those sections dealing with the administrative features of the bill, because it places in the hands of the State board of vocational education created by the State legislature and authorized by section 15 the establishment of the general plans under which vocational education shall be worked out by the respective States. In other words, the autonomy of the States has been respected to the fullest.

It is true that the bill is so safeguarded that if a State shall not, in good faith, observe the spirit of the appropriation, its share of the appropriation may be withheld until Congress, by express act, authorizes its payment. The general administrative scheme, or plan, adopted by the board for vocational education of each State must have the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to the end that he may see that the spirit and purpose of the appropriations are observed and carried out. The section is so important that I shall read it in full:

SEC 19. In order to secure the benefit of the secondary school department fund, the industrial or home economics school fund, the district agricultural school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the normal teachers' training fund, the board for vocational education for each State and the District of Columbia shall adopt, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and place in operation a general administrative scheme or plan, with such modifications as may be made from time to time, for the proper distribution of moneys to schools of secondary grade and to colleges and normal schools as herein provided; for the inspection and approval of such schools and colleges under the provisions of this act; and for the formulation and application in such inspection and approval of standards and requirements in vocational education as to types of schools, location, course of study, qualifications of teachers, methods of instruction, conditions of admission, and employment of pupils. In order that such a plan may be adapted to the needs of the State or the District of Columbia in which it is to become operative, the Secretary of the Interior shall, in passing upon it, and its modifications from time to time, take into consideration the social, economic, industrial, educational, and administrative conditions, and all other relevant circumstances in such State or in the District of Columbia. It shall be the duty of such board for vocational education for any State or the District of Columbia to make annually to the Secretary of the Interior a full and detailed report of its administration of the provisions of this act relating to all such schools of secondary grade and to the training of teachers in colleges and normal schools as herein provided, and to make such additional statements and reports as may be required by the Secretary of the Interior in the discharge of his responsibility under this act.

Section 20 provides that the board of trustees having charge of the State college of agriculture receiving the benefits of the extension-work fund shall do so under general plans approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, and shall cooperate with him in the development of such work, and shall annually make to him full and detailed reports of its operations, receipts, and expenditures.

Section 21 makes it the duty of the State board of trustees having charge of the branch-station fund to administer the fund in accordance with provisions or general plans approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, and to make to him annually a full detailed report of all its operations, receipts, and expenditures.

Section 22 provides that any school receiving funds under this act shall conform to the requirements of the State board for vocational education, shall cooperate with that board in the development of its work, and shall make to that board a full and detailed report of its operations, receipts, and expenditures.

Section 23 provides that in order that any State may receive the benefit of the several school funds provided by this act the State custodian of those funds shall annually make a report to the State board for vocational education of his administration of the moneys received by him for those funds; and in order that the State may receive the benefit of the extension-work fund and branch-station fund, he shall annually make a report to the Secretary of Agriculture of his administration of the moneys received by him for those funds.

Section 24 provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall annually ascertain whether the several funds appropriated by this act for vocational education and for the training of teachers at normal schools have been expended in accordance with the terms of this act, and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury as to each State whether it has complied with the provisions of this act and is entitled to receive its share of such funds.

If the Secretary of the Interior certifies to the Secretary of the Treasury that the State has so complied, the latter official is directed to pay the money to which the State is entitled under this act to the State custodian of the vocational education fund, and upon the requisition of the State board for vocational education such State custodian shall pay to the governing board of any school which should receive the same the sum to which it is entitled under the provisions of this act.

Section 25 charges the Secretary of Agriculture with the duty of ascertaining whether the States receiving the benefits of the extension-work fund or branch-station fund are using them in accordance with the terms of the act. If he finds that they are, he shall so certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, which official is directed to pay to the State custodian for vocational education the sums to which the State is entitled; and upon requisition of the board of trustees, or board of control, of such State college of agriculture or State experiment station, such State custodian shall pay to the treasurer appointed by such board of control the sum which the said college is entitled to receive under the provisions of this act.

Section 26 provides that the "secondary school department fund" shall be used for distinctive studies in, or closely relating to, agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics.

That the "industrial or home economics school fund" shall be used only for distinctive studies in, or closely relating to, the trades, industries, and home economics.

That the "district agricultural school fund" shall be used only for distinctive studies in, or closely relating to, agriculture and home economics.

That the "college teachers' training fund" shall be used only in the preparation of teachers to give practical or technical instruction for useful service in agriculture, the trades and industries, or the home.

That the "normal teachers' training fund" shall be used only for distinctive studies designed to prepare teachers to give practical or technical instruction fitting for useful service in agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics.

That the "extension-work fund" shall be used only for instruction and demonstration in agriculture, home economics, and rural affairs.

And that the "branch-station fund" shall be used only for field tests, plant breeding, animal breeding, home economics, and other scientific work, under plans approved by the directors of State experiment stations of the respective States.

Section 27 provides that if any part of any fund appropriated by this act shall be lost or misapplied it shall be replaced; and until so replaced no subsequent appropriation for such purpose shall be paid.

One of the best provisions in the entire bill is that which provides that the funds hereby appropriated may not be invested in lands or buildings. This provision is so important that I quote it in full.

Mr. THORNTON. What section is that?

Mr. PAGE. This is section 27; it is the last part of the section.

* * * No portion of any moneys appropriated under this act for the benefit of the States or the District of Columbia shall be applied, directly or indirectly, to the purchase, erection, preservation, or repair of any building or buildings or equipment, or to the purchase or rental of lands; and no portion of such moneys shall be expended other than in institutions supported and controlled by the public.

That last line is very important. The schools must be, absolutely, public schools supported and controlled by the public and with public money.

Section 28 provides that all unexpended sums shall be deducted from the next succeeding annual disbursement, in order that the amount of money distributed to any State from any fund provided for in this act shall not exceed the amount actually and necessarily required by the State for the purpose for which such money from such fund may be expended under the provisions of this act.

Section 29 further safeguards the appropriations made by this act by providing that each State shall receive annually only such portion of any fund as, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture, in the discharge of their respective responsibilities, such State has made ample preparation to use to advantage.

Section 30 provides that if the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture shall withhold a certificate for the whole or any part of the allotment to any State, the facts and reasons therefor shall be reported to the President, in order that the State may, if it so desire, appeal to Congress from the determination of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture; and if the next Congress shall not direct that such sum be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury.

Section 31 provides that the moneys distributed to institutions entitled to the benefits of this appropriation shall be in proportion to the amount which each expends out of other income, to be derived from general or from local public funds, for the same purpose, during the same period. There is, however, an alternative clause in this section which provides that funds may be distributed upon some other basis, according to plans previously adopted by the board for vocational education, or by legislative authority if these plans have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

This is a clause which I should like to have Senators especially consider, because it is a very important one. We make provision that each locality shall draw according to the amount it contributes. There is, however, an alternative clause in this section which provides that funds may be distributed upon some other basis, according to plans previously adopted by the board for vocational education, or by legislative authority if those plans have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior. They must be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, because otherwise funds might be diverted from the purposes contemplated by the bill.

It must be borne in mind that this bill is designed to stimulate and encourage, and not to assume, except in a very slight degree, the main burdens of educational support; and after a State has made the proper preparation in the way of providing the required buildings and farm lands to enable it to take advantage of the act, there must then, in addition, be appropriated at least twice as much for these educational purposes as is contributed by the Federal Government.

I regard the closing portion of section 31 as one of the most valuable and important of all the safeguarding provisions of this bill. I quote it in full:

* * * but there shall in no case be disbursed under the terms of this act to any school or college out of moneys derived from the secondary school department fund, the industrial or home economics school fund, the district agricultural school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the normal teachers' training fund, as provided in this act, more money than 50 per cent of the amount which is supplied and expended during the same period for the same purpose, for which such fund is to be expended, out of State or local public moneys.

Mr. WILLIAMS. "State and local," or "State or local"?

Mr. PAGE. Let me explain to the Senator how it is hoped the scheme will work out, and I will illustrate by instancing the States of Massachusetts and New Jersey. The laws of those States provide that when any local community shall have spent a certain amount for vocational educational training the State shall contribute or pay to that community as much as it has raised locally. We hope that to the amount contributed or appropriated by the Federal Government the State will add an equal amount, and that the local community will be then asked to raise as much as the combined contributions of the State and the Federal Government. This will assure good schools.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Vermont does not understand what I am getting at. Suppose that in some case a State did not appropriate as much as the locality, and suppose we have to appropriate $2,000 to meet $1,000 with which the Federal Government gives, why should not that locality have the benefit of the bill? In that case your language would read "State and locality" or "State or locality."

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will suggest an amendment to the section which says "as much as is raised by State and local" or "by State or local," I see no objection to it, but I should dislike to leave out the words "State and local."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no. I did not suggest that. I suggested that the language should be "State and local" or "State or local," the idea in my mind being this: I do not suppose it will occur, but it might happen, that some State might fail to make the appropriation needed, whereas some locality within the State would show the ability and the willingness to meet the appropriation.

Mr. PAGE. I certainly can see no objection to that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I make a suggestion? Supposing the State contributes nothing and the locality contributes something, the contribution then would be simply what the locality had contributed. I can not quite see the difference. The phrase "State and locality" combines both. If one is zero and the other is something else, the contribution is still the sum of the State and locality, is it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but still upon the face of the bill it would require the action of both the State and the locality. We might be turned down here because the State had failed to act. All that is sought in the bill is that they shall contribute twice as much; that twice as much shall come in for the purpose as comes from the Federal Government, making the total money coming in for the purpose three times what the Federal Government contributes. So it struck me that perhaps it would make it plainer to say that, because, if you did, you would accomplish your purpose. I see some reason on the other side of it. The two together might contribute more than they otherwise would, more than 200 per cent of what they are given for the scheme.

I hardly think that what I had in mind would happen, because I imagine that every State would do something, but it might happen that some State would not. Such action might result from some technical reason. For instance, in my State the legislature meets but once in four years, and, therefore, might not be able to meet this appropriation on the part of the Federal Government.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I confess that the idea advanced by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] was one which occurred to my mind when I drew the substitute, but I can see no objection to amending this provision by writing in after the words "State and local" the words "or State or local." I should like to have the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] think the matter over during the day, and then, if he would like to propose that amendment, I now see no reason why I shall not accept it when the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think we had better make that amendment merely for safety.

Mr. PAGE. It will be observed that the Federal Government is in no case to pay to any school or college more than one-half as much as is raised by State and local taxation.

Let me illustrate by reference to a single appropriation: Under this bill there is appropriated to State normal schools and other training schools for the education of teachers for this work, in round numbers, an average of $21,000 for each State. In order to avail themselves of this fund there must be raised by State and local taxation $42,000 more, making $63,000 the average sum per State which must be expended under this act for State normal and other training schools in educating teachers for vocational education work.

And bear in mind, further, that under the provisions of section 26 of the act the normal teachers' training fund can be used only for distinctive studies, which are given in separate units, organized as departments or divisions of State normal schools or other training schools, under a properly qualified head, and which are designed to prepare teachers to give practical or technical instruction fitting for useful service in agriculture, the trades and industries, or home economics.

Observe that this Federal fund may not be used for the instruction of those who are to teach the ordinary, or cultural, studies, but must be used solely to educate those who are to teach the vocational subjects contemplated by this bill. It may be suggested that no State is obliged to accept all the provisions of this bill, but I have little doubt that all of them will; and the wonderful impetus that will be given to the cause of industrial education by this act within the next five years can hardly be overestimated.

Section 32 throws around this appropriation another most excellent safeguard. I quote the section in full:

All States, Territories, and the District of Columbia accepting the benefit of any fund under this act shall provide other moneys with which to pay the cost of providing the necessary lands and buildings, and to pay the entire cost of all instruction, supplementary to the practical and technical instruction provided for in this act, necessary in order to complete well-rounded courses of training, the main purposes of which are to give vocational as well as general preparation for agriculture, the trades and industries, and home making, or to prepare teachers for these vocations, suited to the needs of the respective sections and communities of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator read that over again?

Mr. PAGE. Before I read it, let me say to the Senator that we are very jealous lest the States shall utilize these funds to pay for teaching the ordinary cultural studies. So the bill provides:

SEC. 32. That all States, Territories, and the District of Columbia accepting the benefit of any fund under this act shall provide other moneys with which to pay the cost of providing the necessary lands and buildings, and to pay the entire cost of all instruction, supplementary to the practical and technical instruction provided for in this act, necessary in order to complete well-rounded courses of training, the main purposes of which are to give vocational as well as general preparation for agriculture, the trades and industries, and home making, or to prepare teachers for these vocations, suited to the needs of the respective sections and communities of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to express my gratification that in drafting this bill the Senator from Vermont has not omitted the District of Columbia. There is an anomalous condition existing here under the Morrill Act and supplemental acts, inasmuch as Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Territories, when we had them, are all included in the terms of that act, while the District of Columbia is excluded, or was not mentioned. For several years I have made an effort to get recognition, so that the District of Columbia might have its quota of those funds for the purpose of teaching agriculture and related matters in one of our institutions of learning here, but I have failed to accomplish that result up to the present time. I am glad, however, that the Senator has not forgotten that the National Capital is a place where instruction may well be given in those subjects as well as in ordinary subjects pertaining to university education.

I simply wanted to emphasize that point, and it may help me possibly in the future, if I live long enough, to make another effort to get recognition of the District of Columbia under the existing law.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I only hope I shall find that the Senator will discover enough good things in this bill so that he will support it before he gets through.

I want to say, however, in this connection, that the District of Columbia does not participate in all the funds. It participates in most of the school funds, but not in the funds that provide for district agricultural schools, because those are purely agricultural, and we did not think it best to have the District of Columbia included. Let me say in this connection that our Commissioner of Education, Dr. Claxton, has just returned from Porto Rico. He came to see me yesterday or the day before. He said, "Senator, I really believe that the United States would only do the proper and just thing to include Porto Rico in the provisions of your bill." I said, "Perhaps later we will include Porto Rico, but I do not know but it might imperil the passage of the bill to do it now, and I prefer to wait a while and see. I personally should have no objection to putting in Porto Rico if it was thought best to do so."

It should be noted that these funds can not be diverted from the purposes intended by the act, and that in order to receive the benefits of this fund the States must pay the cost not only of providing the land and buildings, but also the entire cost of such general instruction as is necessary to complete well-rounded courses of training, the main purposes of which are to give vocational training.

Section 33 provides that correspondence for the furtherance of extension work, as provided for in this act, shall be transmitted in the mails free of postage under such regulations as the Postmaster General may from time to time prescribe.

Section 34 provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall make one or more reports to Congress annually of his administration of the several funds paid out under his supervision.

Section 35 provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall make an annual report to Congress of his administration of the funds which come under his supervision.

Section 36 provides that this act shall take effect upon its passage.

Mr. President, it may seem to Senators, from a casual examination, that this bill is unnecessarily long and seemingly complex; but I can assure the Senate that a careful analysis of the bill will show that while it is drawn upon a broad and comprehensive plan, its details have been wrought out with painstaking care and are based upon well-established precedents—precedents which have been successfully worked out in the field of experience.

Its provisions are admirably designed to simplify and unify one of our most comprehensive and complex public enterprises—our public-school system. For Congress to now stop short of the passage of a comprehensive measure which will so supplement the great Morrill land-grant college act of 1862 as to carry the new scientific practice of all the industries to all the people, would be an admission that we are unable properly to utilize the experience of half a century of effort by these State colleges. The very details of this measure will help to so frame up our public-school organization that its government will be simplified. This measure by comprehending the entire field will greatly simplify, where, in the absence of such a law, complexity is constantly arising. In trades schools, for example, this bill has already brought unity of thought and action on the part of organized labor and organized employers.

This is a matter to which I hope Senators will give careful attention. We have brought together the Federation of Labor and the American Association of Manufacturers, which have been so bitter toward each other that they would not meet together in the same room to consider any proposition—we have brought them together on this great question, and they have reached a conclusion in absolutely hearty accord.

The best educators in the country have given to the preparation of this bill, without money and without price, a vast amount of painstaking labor. The national leaders in these two fields have been here brought together in a most marvelous unity for trades-school education as a part of our public-school system, rather than in privately-managed trades schools, which have proven a partial menace to the peaceful settlement of labor disputes. The Society for the Promotion of Industrial Education has sent to me at their own expense their executive secretary, Mr. C. A. Prosser, a man of large experience, and of excellent ability—I want to say that I can not speak too highly of him—and it is no exaggeration to say that he has spent several solid weeks in helping to work out the details of this bill. The commissioner of education, Dr. P. P. Claxton, a man of extensive experience in educational matters, has joined with me in a painstaking revision of every section of the original bill, and it is to these and other educators, many of whom I ought, perhaps, in justice, to mention, that the credit is due for the production of what educators almost everywhere now confess to be a reasonably perfect and practical measure. I have simply brought together as best I might the results of other men's labors. I can only claim myself that I have been diligent and industrious; and that, so far as I know, I have not from the first surrendered any vital principle of the bill or sacrificed any of its fundamentals.

Mr. President, perhaps I may be pardoned for saying that the bill does not consist of a mass of inchoate facts and propositions. It is rather the result of hard months of painstaking labor. It is the bringing together of the views of different educators from almost every State in the Union, and by the adjustment of those views in such a way that the bill in its entirety shall not only be one worthy of adoption on the part of this Senate, but one the provisions of which so articulate with the school laws of the several States as to make it a practical, workable whole. The more Senators will study it the more they will see therein a growth, an evolution, so to speak, with every important point in that evolution so hedged about and safeguarded as to prevent waste and to make it impossible to divert the funds appropriated by the bill from the purposes they were intended to subserve and promote.

Perhaps in passing I ought to mention the fact that some Senators believe that it would be wise to make a compromise by eliminating some of the provisions of the bill and enacting the balance into law, so as to lessen the total sum of money required.

I believe that every feature of this bill is good. I am also firmly of the opinion that, in view of the appropriation of more than $17,000,000 for agriculture in the bill recently passed for the Department of Agriculture, we should now take care of the sons of the laboring men—those who work in the mines and quarries, the factories, and the workshops.

So far as I am personally concerned, while I yield to no man in my desire to promote the welfare of the American farmer, I believe I should be guilty of great dereliction of duty were I to consent to the dismemberment of this bill in such a way as to eliminate from its benefits and its bounties the American boy and girl.

Mr. President, I do not believe that this great, broad, generous proposition—which involves the betterment and the uplift of the sons and daughters of the men of our Nation who toil—can be stopped any more than we can dam the waters of the Niagara. We may cry "Expense!" "Cost!" "Unconstitutionality!" and by so doing delay the passage of the bill, but, like Banquo's ghost, it will not down; and I, for one, will never take counsel of my fears on a measure which I believe to be so everlastingly right.

The fight is going on until success will crown the efforts of some one, if not myself, in order that the great wrong to the chief asset of this country—the American boy—may be righted, and the American people thereby started upward on a broader, better educational highway.

Congress must again blaze an educational trail along the lines of the industries, agriculture, and home economics—a trail which every State in this Union will, in my opinion, promptly follow, to the honor and glory of this great Nation.

The bill makes large appropriations, aggregating, in round numbers, $12,000,000, aside from the education of teachers and branch-station work. Of this sum $3,000,000 is for what is known as agricultural extension work; $3,000,000 for State district agricultural schools; $3,000,000 for the purpose of teaching agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in our general public secondary schools; and $3,000,000 for separate industrial schools in cities.

It will be observed that of this $12,000,000, $6,000,000 is for distinctively agricultural purposes, while $3,000,000 is for schools where the trades and industries, agriculture, and home economics are taught, and $3,000,000 for schools where the trades and industries and home economics are taught. I purpose, first, to discuss this bill from the standpoint of agriculture.

AGRICULTURE.

There is no more serious problem before the American people to-day than that of maintaining the equilibrium of population between rural and urban life, involving as it does that other twin problem—the maintenance of the equilibrium between food production and food consumption.

At a hearing held before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in March last, there appeared before us the representatives of an association of bankers, and I was much impressed with the statement of Mr. Joseph Chapman, jr., chairman of the committee of Northwestern State Agricultural Colleges, and chairman of the American Bankers' committee. He said that they began some five years ago to study this great question from an economic standpoint.

I quote from his statement:

> We found our boys and girls were leaving the farms and going to the cities. In Minnesota one-third of the population of that State lived in three cities. We went about to find out the reasons why the boys and girls were leaving the farms and flocking to the cities, leaving our men and their wives, who ran the farms without help, or with very incompetent hired help. It was a discouraging situation. At the Hull House, in Chicago, last June a man made a canvass of the chief lodging houses in that city and found that there were 20,000 young men under the age of 25 who were sleeping in basements where the water would ooze up through the floors and where they would lie down to sleep with nothing but a newspaper between them and the floor. Those young men were from the farms of our Central States—men looking for jobs in cities. We reached the conclusion that it was largely an educational problem. We found in Minnesota that in 1909 there were 435,000 children of all ages in our schools, which schools were conducted at an expense of about $14,000,000 to the State. Of that 435,000, Mr. Chairman, 1,832 were in our agricultural schools and colleges. In other words, Minnesota was educating 99.6 per cent of the coming generation to be consumers and four-tenths of 1 per cent to be producers, and if you think those figures are exaggerated and do not fit in there, look into the situation in your own State and you will find Minnesota is not alone.
> We have drifted away from practical education and have gotten largely into theoretical and what is called intellectual education, so that the problem in Minnesota is now to get the knowledge from the agricultural schools in our great States out to the 1,000,000 people who live on the farms in the State of Minnesota. There are $400,000,000 worth of products produced annually by these million people living on the farms, and yet Minnesota practically stood still in her rural population in the last 10 years, while the great States of Iowa and Missouri dropped backward.
> But, gentlemen, it is going to take a very long time before this information is going to percolate and get to the people under our present methods. In our own school system in the State of Minnesota, we have changed in the last three years. There are now in Minnesota 80 high schools where agriculture, domestic science, and vocational training are taught, and the reason there are not more is because we can not get the instructors.

Mr. President, the social life of the city offers advantages which the boys and girls are unable to find in rural life; but, more than all this, the energetic, active, enterprising farmer's boy looks forward to the future and asks: If I am faithful, if I am enterprising and industrious—in other words, if I make good—what is there in the future for me? Under conditions as they now exist he is led to the conclusion that the possibilities of success are greater in the city than in the country. As Banker Chapman well said in his remarks before our committee:

> For a hundred years in this country we have been taking the boys and girls away from the farm and sending them into the cities, and it is going to be a hard siege before we can get conditions in the country so that a man will be satisfied to live there. Fifteen or twenty-five years ago it used to be the practice for one or two boys or one or two girls from a large family to go to the city. Now the farmer sells the farm and the whole family moves there, and he is oftentimes the best farmer in the community.

Mr. President, we all know how natural it is for the more enterprising of our boys and girls to seek occupations which they regard as more genteel—positions in the store and the office. There is an unnatural glamor accompanying the securing of a situation behind a counter that does not exist in a job on the farm where the boy follows the plow and milks the cows.

Up to within a few years the enterprising son of the farmer of the East could see a competence in going to the West and taking up a homestead. To-day he knows that practically all the good lands of the country which could be taken under the homestead laws are exhausted.

Mr. President, I might elaborate upon this feature of the argument indefinitely, but I think it is unnecessary. Unpalatable as it is, the fact confronts us that something must be done to change this constant drainage from country to city—the depopulation of much of the best blood of our rural communities—or within 10 years, perhaps within 5, we shall not only cease to be a food-exporting Nation, but shall actually be importing our cereals.

Mr. President, am I wrong in supposing that the productivity of our farm lands is an important economic condition which we should, as a Nation, seek to remedy? If a remedy can be found for the high prices of foods, should it not be applied, if the expense to the Federal Government is only commensurate and proper in view of the end to be obtained? Is the expense of 1¼ cents per month per capita of our population more than the exigencies of the situation warrant? I think not. I say 1¼ cents per month. Let me interject here that if this bill in 1921 reaches its maximum, the entire cost to the American people will be less than 1¼ cents per capita per month.

It seems to me that the great question before the country now is: Can these conditions be changed; and if so, how? I feel that they can be, and that this bill suggests the way, namely, by bringing about more profitable and better farming.

One of the methods for reaching this end is provided by section 7 of this bill, which appropriates for agricultural extension work. This means that actual demonstrations will be taken to the farmer on his own farm, or on some farm in his vicinity, the results of the research work which have been accumulating through the agency of the experiment stations connected with the different State agricultural colleges and of departments of agriculture for the past 50 years.

We recently had before our Committee on Agriculture and Forestry some very interesting hearings with reference to this agricultural extension work.

Among those who appeared before us was Dr. W. O. Thompson, president of the Ohio State University; Dr. H. L. Russell, dean of the College of Agriculture of the University of Wisconsin; Dr. T. C. Atkeson, professor of animal husbandry of the University of West Virginia; Dr. W. D. Gibbs, president of the New Hampshire College of Agriculture; Dr. Howard Edwards, president of the Rhode Island State College; Dr. Andrew M. Soule, president of the State College of Agriculture of Georgia, and a number of other leading educators connected with agricultural work.

I was particularly interested in the statement of Dr. Soule, because there is probably no educator better known in the South than he. He impressed me as a man of ability, and as one who is not only aggressive, but progressive in all that pertains to the educational welfare of our country. Coming as he does from the great Empire State of the South, perhaps the most progressive of any of the Southern States in matters of agricultural education, his views are especially important. They are so thoroughly practical that I believe that Senators may profitably give to them something more than casual consideration. I shall not give them in full, but, rather, quote the more important of his remarks before our committee. He said:

> This problem is of so great magnitude that it is almost impossible to know where to begin an adequate discussion of it within the very limited time at one's disposal. I judge from the tenor of the questions asked here that possibly this distinguished body of men do not quite grasp the gravity of the situation in American agriculture at the present time. The use of fertilizers commenced in the South, roughly speaking, shortly prior to the war between the States. Last year something like 5,000,000 tons were used, of which more than 1,300,000 tons were applied in the State of Georgia, which I happen to represent on this occasion. That means a tax on the production of our State of approximately $25,000,000.
> Last year we successfully increased the yield of cotton, because of the beneficent information emanating from the extension work which we are endeavoring to do. But if you take the history of the application of commercial fertilizers for the last 50 or 60 years, you will find the production of lint cotton per acre stands almost still. It is quite evident, therefore, that we face a crisis in southern agriculture. It is true commercial fertilizers are necessary on our soils under existing conditions. It is also true that we are now reaching a point where a different system of agriculture must be instituted or fertilizers will fail to give a responsive profit on our land. What must we do? Can we afford to sit still when there hangs in the balance an export crop or a crop, which, exported, brings a balance of trade to our credit of nearly $700,000,000? Can we afford to see the price of lint cotton become prohibitive?
> I say, Mr. Chairman, this is not a local question; it is a national question; and the people of Massachusetts and the people of California are just as much interested and concerned in this problem as the people of Georgia. Can we remedy such a condition; is it possible? I will be specific for your information along this line. Five years ago we took in our demonstration a field—and it has been representative of land in many other points in the State—which without fertilizer produced a third of a bale per acre. Last year it produced 3 bales of cotton per acre. How was this extraordinary result brought about? The land was simply deeply broken, then it was properly cultivated, and a crop of cowpeas, gathering nitrogen out of the air, was turned under; a light application of cow manure and a thousand pounds of what we call three-four fertilizer was applied to the soil.
> I have not figured out the percentage of the increase, but I leave you to judge of putting principles of this kind within the reach of the cotton farmer who to-day is using an inadequate kind of fertilizer and who is harvesting a third of a bale to an acre. You may ask me, May this be duplicated on the average farm, and was this done at a profit? It was done at a profit of $150 to the acre, and it has been duplicated on many farms in Georgia, and it is a matter of opportunity through extension teaching to have it duplicated on thousands of other farms. This one illustration must serve to show you the gravity of the situation which confronts us and to let you see that production in this country is not maintaining its increased yield from the consuming power of the Nation, and that applies, Mr. Chairman, not only to raw materials which are the basis of our manufactures, but to food materials as well. This point I desire to make clear: Agricultural science is far in advance of agricultural practice. * * *
> Now, we may write bulletins, Mr. Chairman, indefinitely; they are good; there is a percentage of the American farmers who read them, but it is a limited per cent. We are not trying to help that man. I would not have the transcript show that I was indifferent to that man, for we want to serve him, we must help him because he is a leader; but we must also reach the ninety and nine who are not in position to help themselves and whose opportunities may not have been such as to enable them to take the bulletin and use it.
> We have 15 men in our extension department who have been termed "agricultural drummers." These men go out, for instance, to Mr. Smith's place, and Mr. Smith has been trying, possibly, to raise a bale of cotton per acre, but he has failed.
> Our man comes along and diagnoses his soil and tells him a method of preparation; he tells him what type of seed to select which will be resistant to this disease or that disease, and he grows that cotton and raises a bale per acre, and he thus has the stimulus and the scientific proof brought to his very door. Mr. Chairman, you have made a new citizen of that man; you have changed his outlook on life; you have given him a broad horizon; you have made him proud that he is a citizen of the United States; and you have endowed him with power. Can you afford and can we afford to neglect these millions of men who are not doing for this Nation, for themselves, and for their families what they ought to do because we have accumulated knowledge and lock it up and say you shall not have it?
> I want to speak of several other things briefly, and one is about the boys and girls who work in my State. I do not want to repeat what these other gentlemen have said, but I want to tell you what the extension work is doing for those boys and girls. I would like to say for the information of the Senators here that Georgia is doing her share in extension work. Our State is appropriating something like $45,000 every year to this work, and there is being subscribed in Georgia, through chambers of commerce, through boards of education, and through individual citizens, nearly $16,000 this year. Now, what about our boys' work? For a long time the yield of corn in Georgia stood at 12 bushels to the acre. Year before last it went up 2 bushels, and last year it went up nearly 2 bushels more.
> Several years ago Georgia was raising about 42,000,000 bushels of corn. Last year it jumped to 73,000,000 bushels. Last year, when every Southern State—please examine the statistics for yourself—fell off on account of the unprecedented drought, Georgia showed an increase of nearly 2 bushels to the acre, and between nine and ten million bushels increase for the State. * * *
> In the seventh congressional district of Georgia last year some 1,200 boys grew corn under advice and direction. They had to submit an elaborate report that was testified to by their county school commissioners and by other authorities in that county. Those 1,200 boys increased the yield of corn on their plats of land over the average land of the State of Georgia last year to a value of $50,000.
> These things can not be gainsaid, because they are facts. They show the power of bringing this truth to the youth on the farm who has not had an opportunity, who has believed his father a failure, who has believed agriculture a failure, and who has crowded into the city as a result.
> If we are to do something to bind our people to the soil, and especially the rising generation, we must show them the power of development of the soil as applied to making agriculture a profitable industry. I can only, of course, touch on some of these few extensions; there are many other extensions. As a result of the agricultural club work in Georgia last year a country boy—I think he is nearly 18 years of age—is to have a college education, and is to become a man that I believe the State of Georgia and I hope the people of the United States will live to be proud of.
> We have on our farms in Georgia something like 350,000 to 400,000 boys and girls growing up without direction, without knowledge of their environment, without any appreciation of the opportunity which soil and this State holds out to them.
> We can correct that defect in our educational system, and we can do more to help the school and the home. We can bring a greater impulse to our rural school system through extension teaching than any other agency which has yet been devised.
> I do not speak, I hope, in an overbold manner when I make this statement, because my experience, after all, is very limited, though I have had over 20 years' service in agricultural work, and I think it should entitle me to have seen something of the need out in the country and to understand a little about the application of the remedy. Soil knowledge is fundamental to our people; that has been touched on, but

I want to illustrate about what has been happening and why we must correct it, and then I will try to point out to you this measure as a means of accomplishing this end.

The virgin soil from Banks County, Ga., contains 6,400 pounds of nitrogen per acre-foot, 4,000 pounds of phosphoric acid, and nearly 15,000 pounds of potash per acre-foot. That same type of soil under cultivation 50 years by the methods practiced, not alone in Georgia, but throughout the South, and largely all over the United States, analyzes about 2,000 pounds of nitrogen, less than 2,000 pounds of phosphoric acid, and in many instances not over 6,000 to 8,000 pounds of potash. These results have been obtained in our own laboratories. You can think of the comparative waste which has gone on in this country and which is going on unimpeded to-day. There is no nation except the United States which could have stood the loss of soil food, which means gold just the same as you take wealth out of the mines.

No other nation could have stood it, and we could not have stood it but for the mere richness of our virgin soil. In Georgia we are trying to farm our lands in about the same way they do in all of the States. I will take you down to the seashore in southeast Georgia, where they grow sea-island cotton, where their soils contain less than 1,000 pounds of nitrogen, 600 pounds of phosphorus, and 400 pounds of potash per acre-foot. You see this is a sand bed. * * *

On our farms we have no business policy. Any institution that tried to operate in Washington for a year would go to the wall under that plan. We must therefore put a business policy on our farms and conserve not only our soil, but conserve our people, and educate a generation how to live in the country and take out of the soil something for their own maintenance and leave something for commerce and industry as well. * * *

All over the State of Georgia goes up this cry for help, this cry for assistance. Our people have come to realize that we have a great body of knowledge, which means life and opportunity to them, and they are calling on us to come out and serve them. We are doing all that men can do under the circumstances, and the State, I think, is doing its part; but if we are to reach this problem, and to reach it at the right time, we must have this movement stimulated by making it a great national problem, and then the weak States and those places where the work is being neglected will get in line and we will make a forward movement for the redirection and the institution of a constructive policy in our agriculture which will bring about the desired results.

Mr. President, as Dr. Soule and others have shown, we have been hugging the delusion that we were getting wealthy from farming, whereas, as a matter of fact, we have been taking the nitrogen, the phosphoric acid and potash, and the vegetable matter, or humus, from our virgin soils and selling them in the form of cereals and fibers; and before we can become prosperous farmers we must learn how to restore to the soil those ingredients of which we have been so prodigal. Germany has for many centuries been exhausting her productivity just as we have been for the last century, but she understands better than we do the best methods of restoration and fertilization, through rotation of crops and the conservation and use of waste material, and how to increase the productivity of the soil by the economic use of commercial fertilizers.

The following table, which I take from page 13 of Senate Document No. 76, Sixty-second Congress, first session, shows some most astonishing facts in regard to our inefficiency as farmers. It compares the increase in yield of five staple crops in Germany and the United States from 1878 to 1909:

Increase in yield of five staple crops in Germany and the United States.

	Germany.		United States.		Increase.
	1878–1883	1909	1879	1909	Germany.	United States.	Germany.	United States.
	Bushels per acre.	Bushels per acre.	Bushels per acre.	Bushels peracre.	Bushels.	Bushels.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Rye	15.7	29.4	14.5	16.1	13.7	1.6	87.2	10.9
Wheat	19.2	30.5	13.8	15.8	11.3	2.0	58.8	14.2
Barley	24.5	39.4	24.0	24.3	14.9	.3	60.8	1.2
Oats	31.8	59.1	28.7	30.3	27.7	1.6	85.8	6.7
Potatoes	115.5	208.9	98.9	106.8	93.4	7.6	80.8	7.6

An analysis of this table shows substantially this:

In rye Germany increased her production 87 per cent, the United States only 10 per cent.

In wheat Germany increased her production 58 per cent, the United States only 14 per cent.

In barley Germany increased her production 60 per cent, the United States only 1 per cent.

In oats Germany increased her production 85 per cent, the United States only 6 per cent.

In potatoes Germany increased her production 80 per cent, the United States only 7 per cent.

Germany, with an area equal only to Minnesota, Iowa, and Missouri, produces three-fifths as much oats, four-fifths as much hops, four-fifths as much barley, three times as much sugar, six times as many potatoes, and nine times as much rye as we do in the whole United States.

Mr. President, in 1907 Germany had 43,000,000 acres sowed to wheat, barley, rye, oats, and potatoes, and harvested therefrom 3,000,000,000 bushels; while from the 88,500,000 acres sowed to the same crops in the United States American farmers harvested only 1,875,000,000 bushels. In other words, from less than one-half of the area German farmers harvested nearly double the number of bushels.

The matter may be stated in this form:

If on the land we devote to wheat, oats, barley, rye, and potatoes American farmers secured the same yield per acre as is secured by German farmers our farmers would be richer by $1,400,000,000 a year.

The fact that Germany has been cropping her land for centuries is all the evidence we need that if we will follow in her footsteps in the way of progressive farming we may restore our lands as she has done.

Here is another statement which I am sure will interest Senators, because it bears directly upon agricultural education:

France is the size of our three greatest wheat-producing States—Kansas, Minnesota, and North Dakota. In 1907 France sowed 16,000,000 acres to wheat, as did these three States. Since the introduction of beet culture French soils have been so rejuvenated that from her 16,000,000 acres of wheat French farmers harvested 325,000,000 bushels, while from our 16,000,000 acres the farmers of Kansas, Minnesota, and North Dakota harvested but 188,000,000 bushels, or 11.7 bushels to the acre to the Frenchman's 20.3 bushels.

This great economic problem is so all-important that it is to-day occupying the attention of the leading statesmen of our country as it has never done before. Among others who have spoken and written upon the question is Gov. Harmon, of Ohio. In an article on "Back to the Land" he emphasizes the fact to which I have been alluding, namely, that in the field of agriculture our country makes a poorer showing than in that of any of the other of our industries. His article is so replete with good sound sense that I am inclined to read a half dozen paragraphs thereform. He says:

The average yield of all farm products in this great agricultural country is not creditable. She makes a poor showing in comparison with other nations, poorer in that than in any other industry.

The figures in the reports taken from the official records of Germany, England, France, and the Netherlands show that they raise from two to two and a half and three times more of all sorts of products to the acre than we do, and they have no better soil and no better climate. God has not smiled more brightly on any other land than ours.

We have the soil, we have the rainfall, we have the climate. You can trust nature to produce if you give nature the chance. And yet, while all other lines of our industries have received a great impetus from intelligent thought, agriculture seems to have been largely passed by. Too widely the idea prevails that all a man has to do is to scratch the ground, sow some seed into it, plow once in a while, and trust the Lord to do the rest.

The most productive thing is practical intelligence properly applied, and this must be done in agriculture as well as anything else.

What is the reason that the little country of France, which is not as big as one State in the American Union, could pay that enormous war indemnity to Germany, which everybody thought would break her up, and in 20 or 25 years after be the great creditor nation that she is to-day?

They have 45,000 agricultural schools in France, every one of them with a little plat around it, where they not merely teach boys out of books, but send them to the field to learn what must be done to make things grow under the smile of God; and the result is that France is the greatest producer and the greatest creditor nation in the world to-day, while we are just beginning to wake up in this country.

Really, Mr. President, may it not be fairly inferred that the facts given by Gov. Harmon as to the French schools are in some measure responsible for this condition, and may we not profit by the example which France has set for us in this matter of agricultural education?

I clipped from the Washington Post last week this little item which, it seems to me, shows the wonderful prosperity of France:

PARIS, May 21.

The issue of city of Paris bonds to the total of $41,000,000 for the extension of the municipal gas system has been oversubscribed 80 times. This means that the French people have subscribed to the amount of $3,280,000,000 and have actually paid in cash to-day more than $115,000,000, as each subscriber had to deposit $2 per bond subscribed for. The issue was oversubscribed in Paris alone 70 times.

The question of profitable farming to-day is coming to be largely a matter of rotation of crops, of fertilization, of better seeds, and of better breeds of stock. We have no more land to exploit, unless it be land the cultivation of which will have to be made profitable by the clearing of needed forests or by irrigation or drainage. We must increase the productivity of the acres we have or become a food-importing nation.

Mr. President, we have for more than a century been deceiving ourselves. From the platform and the stump we have been wont to boast about our boundless natural resources, but students are now coming to see that unless we change our present processes these resources will be largely exhausted within a period that to the farsighted statesman is but a day.

We have been exporting millions upon millions of bushels of wheat and corn supposedly at a profit, but our scholars who have been making the question of soil fertility a study for the past decade are now able to say to us, as the result of their research, that every bushel of wheat carries with it 27 cents' worth of phosphorus, every bushel of corn 13 cents' worth; and our friends from the South now know, as they did not know 20 years ago, that every pound of cotton takes from the soil 3 cents' worth of phosphorus. When we consider the hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat and corn and the millions upon millions of pounds of cotton which we have been exporting, the extent of soil depletion is something fearful to contemplate. As President Wallace recently expressed it, "The nineteenth century farmer was no farmer at all; he was a miner, mining the fertility of the soil and selling it for the bare cost of mining."

Mr. President, this is not a pleasant picture to place before this Senate, but we may as well look the fact squarely in the face now as later. If it were necessary to accept these facts as proof incontrovertible of a continued decadence in our rural population they would be indeed startling.

But I do not believe they are; for now that we have exploited all our virgin soils, and the demand is for more corn, more wheat, more foodstuffs of all kinds, with which to feed the American people, we shall stop and think.

In the process of time—and I believe that time will arrive within the next 10 years—the slipshod, unscientific methods of farming which we are now practicing must be superseded by more progressive and more intelligent methods or the problem of the high cost of living will continue to grow more and more acute until it becomes unbearable.

The remedy is at hand and may be easily applied; and that remedy will, in my judgment, come from the more intelligent methods of farming which will result from this bill.

I was very much interested in Dean Russell's very vigorous remarks on this point before our Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He spoke particularly of the work of Dr. Hopkins, of Illinois, who, Dean Russell asserts, is one of the greatest soil chemists in America. He has been for years laboring on this problem of soil fertility. I read from Dean Russell's statement:

> The essence of all curative processes is to first start with a diagnosis. If you have anything the matter with you, you want your physician first to make a proper diagnosis; and, gentlemen, we are already reaching the stage where we have to have a soil doctor; we are reaching the stage where we have to know what the condition of that soil is; and Dr. Hopkins goes out and makes these investigations of the soil and finds out whether the soil lacks in phosphate, lacks in potash, or lacks in nitrogen, and then applies the remedies. Let me give you one case which Dr. Hopkins told me about down in Illinois.
> Down near Egypt, in the southern part of Illinois, where the land is poor, they started one of these demonstration farms, and Dr. Hopkins's analysis showed that that soil was lacking in phosphate and that an application of $1.50 worth of phosphate per acre to that soil would change it from a soil that would normally yield from 12 to 13 bushels of corn to one which would yield from 50 to 60 bushels. Now, here is a fact which Dr. Hopkins told me about: They started a demonstration farm at one of those sections, called in the farmers from all the surrounding counties, and called a meeting, at which they pointed out the value of rock phosphate as a remedy to a depleted soil in restoring the fertility.
> One gray-haired old man came up to Dr. Hopkins and said, with tears in his eyes, "Mr. Hopkins, I want to thank you for what I have seen to-day, but, God help me, if I only knew that thing 40 years ago." He said, "I have got six boys in my family, and I have labored night and day to keep body and breeches together and to keep the family together, and what have I got on my farm—12 to 15 and 16 bushels of corn to the acre is all that I could make." He further said, "Now, I would like to have sent my boys to college; I would like to have given those children an education, but I could not raise enough crops on that piece of land that I have owned, and so I have tilled all my lifetime and have earned barely enough to support my family. Now," he said, "if a man had only come to me when I was a comparatively young man and told me the thing that you have told me to-day—that $1.50 of rock phosphate would have given me the 50 bushels of corn crop, the crop which was raised right over the fence from where I am—I could have sent my children to the high school and to a university, and" he said, with tears running down his face, "I am at the end, and nobody told me that."

Mr. President, in talking with an intelligent farmer in my own State not long since, he told me that 60 per cent of all the cows kept by the farmers of Vermont probably netted them a loss, the profit being made out of the best 40 per cent. The breeding of stock—not only of cattle, but of horses, poultry, sheep, and hogs—has been done in such a haphazard, unscientific way that there is no wonder that in some sections of the country it has been found unprofitable.

Vermont is one of the most progressive States in the Union in the matter of dairying. With her little more than 9,000 square miles, a goodly portion of which is mountainous and can not be profitably cultivated, she produced, in 1909, 35,394,000 pounds of butter. Maine, with her much larger area, stands second in New England States, with a production of 15,405,000 pounds. Vermont has found her dairy interests so profitable that she has practically abandoned her sheep industry, and to-day, instead of raising our own draft horses with which to cultivate our farms, we are bringing them from Iowa. The reason for this is that our farmers have become better students with reference to the breeding of stock. Native cows have given place to the Jersey, the Guernsey, and the Ayrshire.

We have imported our varieties of plants and animals from Europe, and we have too long assumed that they have the best possible heredity to make them profitable in our climate.

West Europe can not grow our American varieties of corn in its cloudy, moist, cool climate; yet we have assumed that the varieties of wheat, oats, barley, and sugar beets, long bred to suit these conditions, were the best varieties for our land of sunshine, with its dry and warm summers.

We have only begun to breed new varieties of field, garden, and horticultural crops. We are as yet so new that we are exploring the world to find varieties bred for climates like ours. The results of breeding vegetables and fruits in New England and California; of breeding corn, as in Illinois and Indiana; of breeding cereals, as in Minnesota and Ontario; of breeding cotton, as in the South, and flax in the Middle Northwest, show that public investments along this line yield hundreds of per cent profit.

The branch stations provided in this bill have proven necessary to serve as additional plant breeding and testing stations, where varieties can be created and tested so that the valuable new kinds may be distributed to all growers. In like manner we have accepted from west Europe the breeds of animals there created through centuries of careful, though not really scientific, methods of breeding. We have created enough breeds in this country to show that breeds can be created which are peculiarly adapted to our needs, and the science of creating valuable breeds of animals as well as valuble breeds of plants has now been as well wrought out in this as in any other country.

The proposed branch stations will serve the experts of the State experiment stations and of the Department of Agriculture as centers where those breeds of animals and varieties of plants can be improved, tested, and made available to the farmers of the respective agricultural regions.

Manifestly we are doing about 1 per cent of the scientific improvement of the heredity of our plants and animals which we should. For example, there might properly be one cooperative animal-breeding project at every one of the proposed branch stations, in which the cooperating group of breeders might have scientific direction from the State experiment station and the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. President, we shall need to double our agricultural products to accommodate twice our present population two generations hence.

Experts in plant and animal breeding offer abundant proof that between 10 and 20 per cent of this increase can be brought about by scientific plant and animal breeding.

Not of the least interest is the fact that the cost of the permanent changes made once for all in the heredity of plants and animals is so slight that the added result lowers the cost of production and therefore contributes to a larger degree to keeping down the cost of food than any other improvement in agriculture excepting the improvement made in the efficiency of the people through education and demonstration.

Mr. President, in view of the facts and figures which I have given—and they are, in my judgment, thoroughly established and beyond question—is it any wonder that the agricultural sections in many parts of this land have been showing a decadence in population?

I have been so much interested in this question of the decadence of our rural population that I have made an investigation as to the number of counties in the United States which show an actual loss in population between 1880 and 1910. It will undoubtedly surprise many Senators to be told that there are 252 in the United States which actually have a less population to-day than they had 30 years ago, and, with very rare exceptions, those counties are in our farming or rural sections.

TRADES AND INDUSTRIES.

In the discussion of this measure thus far, I have asked the attention of the Senate chiefly to agriculture and home economics. I have tried to show that, as a great economic proposition, farming must be made more profitable, farm homes better and rural life generally improved and different from what it is to-day, to the end that equilibrium between the city and country might be restored.

I think I have dwelt at sufficient length upon these points, and I now ask the attention of Senators to a question which in many respects is more important than all the other important features to which I have referred, and that is: What are we going to do with and for the boys in the cities? From every quarter comes the disquieting intelligence that the drift has been going from bad to worse until to-day it threatens our very political existence as a nation. The question of good citizenship attaches to our rural life, and there is every reason why we should consider the character of our citizenship as it apper-tains to the boy on the farm. But in the immediate present at least there are no such alarming dangers confronting rural life as are at present manifest in that substratum of humanity which flocks to the congested sections in all our larger cities.

Our discussions in the Senate during the past three years upon the great question of conservation would fill volumes—indeed, Mr. President, it has filled volumes. It has been one of the leading topics of discussion throughout the land, and it is right that it should be. We should preserve our forests, our mines, our quarries, and our water power, but this is not all.

Prof. Carver, of Harvard University, well says:

In the present conservation movement it is highly important that we realize two things: First, that our most valuable resources are our people; and, second, that we are wasting people more than we are wasting anything else.

And he very forcibly adds:

If we forget either of these things, we shall find ourselves trying to save at the spigot while we are wasting at the bung.

Mr. President, a leading educator has said that:

By industrial education we are asked to shape the lives of the children of to-day, and thereby to make the men and women of to-morrow—the American of to-morrow. Each year 2,500,000 graduate from our elementary schools, proud and confident in having accomplished the first great task of their lives in successfully finishing the eight years' course with credit. An equal number of children, a vast army of two and a half million little ones, most of them only 14 years of age, leave the same schools discredited, unsuccessful, aimless, most of them having gotten no further than the sixth grade, having learned little else than the three R's, not educated in any sense, but only possessed of the rudiments whereby real education may be acquired. They have been, in a way, schooled only in how to fail. These are the children who go into the industries and deserve and require industrial or trade education.

The Daily Iron Trade Review, in its issue of April 30, in a vigorous editorial upon this bill, uses this language:

The untrained man is not necessarily a day laborer. He is such a man, however, as, when thrown off his present employment and upon his own resources—oftentimes slender—becomes a menace to society either actively or passively.

Something must be done for him, and this something the Society for the Promotion of Industrial Education believes can be afforded through the Page bill. There are many young men wasting their efforts along more or less unprofitable lines of endeavor who would be valuable members of society if they could have had the advantage of a special training when of suitable age.

It must be made almost impossible for there to be such an anomaly as an untrained man before our country can claim rightfully to have afforded every man an equal chance. There is a place for the Society for the Promotion of Industrial Education in the United States. There should be a place in the Federal statute books for the Page bill.

Vocational education helps the boy "to find himself," especially if we link his vocational education with the seventh and eighth grades—before compulsory education ceases. Modern application of education to practical life contemplates not only assistance to the boy to find himself, as they say, but it aids him in finding a place where he can get employment.

One of the best illustrations of how this trying-out process—the process of helping the boy to find himself—works out may be found in Newton, Mass. In the school system itself there is a bureau where every scholar is studied with reference to his physical and mental capacities and endowments. He is studied psychologically and his traits of character ascertained. His past school record is examined, heredity as well as environment is considered, and the boy's own tastes and tendencies are, as a matter of course, made the subject of study.

When this is done, a decision is made as to what general department of labor he is best fitted for, and then his school life is laid out upon that basis, and at the same time the bureau takes upon itself the burden of finding the boy a place to work in such occupation as it has been previously decided he is best adapted to fill.

Mr. Meyer Bloomfield, director Boston Vocation Bureau, has well expressed the situation as to this matter. He says:

The rediscovery of the child in school and shop has become the task of our agents. Too long have children been living and learning and working together as fractions of selves. Personality is subordinated to system. Excessive organization is stifling child energies struggling for self-expression. Vocational guidance looks to the whole child, to its past, present, and future. Through its efficacious interest and cooperating agencies it demands the utmost investment of all that a child is and may become.

Mr. President, I almost tremble lest I seem to give prominence to the widening gulf between capital and labor. I hope I am not a pessimist, and yet I confess that when I read an alarming emanation of one who has a right to speak for labor I am inclined to "stop, look, and listen."

Raymond Robins, who is known as the "social expert" in what is called the "Men and religion movement," gives expression to the following thought, and I want Senators to allow that thought to sink deep into their minds. He says:

The old vertical lines of social division—by income, profession, and family—are gone. The new line is horizontal. Above it are all those who live by dividends and below it are all those who live by labor. Already it is more than a line—it is a crack, a cleavage. And I tell you that unless that cleavage is bridged in the next 10 years it never will be bridged in our time.

Raymond Robins was giving expression to no threat; indeed, he may be wrong in regard to his diagnosis of the future of the American people, but does it not behoove us as Senators to take cognizance of the utterances and claims of a man like Raymond Robins; and if we can lift some of those below the horizontal line to which he refers and give them a portion of the part above the line, should we not do it?

Mr. President, there is no way to do this except by reaching down and taking the hands of those below the line and, through vocational education, do what we can do to bridge this cleavage, and we must do it now. Raymond Robins says that unless it is bridged within the next 10 years it never will be bridged.

I am not ready to confess this—it may not be true—but I am not fully prepared to say that there is not some element of truth in his warning.

I am ready to give the benefit of the doubt to the cause of the sons of the men who toil, even though the expense of doing so to the Federal Government might be even more than 15 cents per capita per annum of our population, the amount called for by this bill.

Place over against this statement of Raymond Robins another, which appeared in our Washington dailies May 17. I read:

HARVARD'S FINANCES.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., May 17.

Harvard University, according to the annual financial report, now has $25,000,000 in productive funds, of which $17,000,000 is in stocks and bonds. This is an increase of a million and a quarter over last year. From these funds the university has an annual income of $2,500,000.

Mr. President, I glory in our New England colleges. It has been well said that they "have sprung from the very soil, and the lifeblood of our fathers is in them."

He would be bold indeed who should undertake to capitalize the good will of the old-time colleges of New England or to estimate the power that inheres in their long record of usefulness and leadership.

Long may they live, and may the power of their usefulness and leadership continue. Their walls have risen from the modest bounty of New England yeoman, and men and women have worn homespun that the colleges of their boys might continue to live. It has been the best blood of rural New England that has peopled the plains and cities of the West, and the vigorous leaven of New England stock in western communities, from Ohio to California, has been drawn from the best-educated and most progressive element of the small towns of the country districts of rocky New England.

I have asked the United States Commissioner of Education, Dr. Claxton, to give me a statement showing the number of scholars, respectively, in the elementary or grammar grades, the secondary or high schools, and the colleges, together with the percentage of cost for each class.

It will probably surprise those who have not given the matter much consideration to learn that only 1.71 per cent are in the college grades; only 5.35 per cent in the secondary, or high-school, grades. The great mass of our boys—to be exact, 92.93 per cent—are in the elementary grades.

The commissioner's report shows that we are taking splendid care of those who enjoy the benefits of high-school and college courses—the 7 per cent—but we are not doing our duty to the other 93 per cent—the children of those who, by reason of having to become the breadwinners of the family, do not pass beyond the elementary grades.

The commissioner states that the cost of pupils in the elementary grades is $21.78 per capita; of those in the public high schools, $45; of those in the university, $280.

With the consent of the Senate, I will include in my remarks the table furnished by Dr. Claxton.

Per cent of enrollment and per cent of cost for the three grades in 1908–9.

Grades.	Per cent of enrollment.	Per cent of cost.
Elementary	92.93	74.68
Secondary	5.35	10.08
Higher	1.71	15.24

Practically all of these boys who are in the 92 per cent class are to-day deprived of any kind of vocational or industrial training. And because of this fact they are swelling the ranks of our outcasts and criminals and filling our jails and asylums with the flotsam and the jetsam of our social life. They form the very scum which rises to the top of the great seething caldron of uneducated humanity and is forming that uncontrollable element which is the natural outgrowth of the injustice which is to-day being practiced on the sons of our toiling millions in the matter of withholding from them a decent measure of vocational and industrial training.

Mr. President, there is no truer saying than that "talent should lay its tribute upon the altar of human need." If there is any human need demanding tribute from the best talent of this Senate more than the need of the average American boy, I do not know where it is.

To-day, in my humble judgment, the sons of our toiling millions are not receiving that fair equality of opportunity to which they are entitled; and let us not deceive ourselves with the idea that these boys, as they grow up, will fail to note and keenly feel that inequality of opportunity.

They have minds no less acute, perception no less keen than those of us who have enjoyed a better education. They know they have not had a square deal, and, knowing this, is it any wonder that there is discontent and that as a result of this discontent the standard of citizenship is being lowered? Is it not true that in the minds of by far too large a percentage of them the Stars and Stripes is not that emblem of justice and equality which it ought to be? And yet, Mr. President, when we confront a proposition like the one now before us we are met with the cry of expense, cost, and unconstitutionality.

I wish to state with all the force at my command that, in my judgment, any bill the chief purpose of which is the promotion of good citizenship is not unconstitutional, because good citizenship is an absolute sine qua non for the general welfare and common defense. The very foundations of good citizenship lie in loyal, contented, and intelligent and prosperous people.

Mr. President, it is a condition, and not a theory, that confronts this Government to-day. If our citizens in the generation ahead of us are not able to earn a decent livelihood and give their children such an education as will equip them to run the race of life with a fair measure of success, it will be impossible to convince them that they are receiving that equality of opportunity to which they are entitled and without which they can not be loyal citizens.

Mr. President, this is an age of steam, of electricity, of enterprise and progress. To-day there are few, if any, laboring men in this country who do not, through the press and otherwise, keep in touch with the most advanced modern thought in so far as it relates to their own personal welfare.

The Grange and other like organizations represent the farmer; the American Federation of Labor, the American Manufacturers' Association, and kindred associations and organizations represent those engaged in industrial pursuits; and I wish to state to this Senate to-day that if there is a single association of any considerable size, either along the lines of agriculture or the mechanic arts, that has not discussed this measure fully and passed judgment upon it, I do not know where that organization is.

It has been said that the leaders in the American Federation of Labor were opposed to the education of large numbers along industrial lines. It is not true.

It has been said that the great Association of Manufacturers find it more profitable to work ignorant than skilled men. It is not, in my judgment, true. It is an interesting fact, Mr. President, that during one of the days of March last, Mr. H. E. Miles, chairman of the committee on industrial education of the National Association of Manufacturers, and Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, were together here at Washington. I sought an interview at which both of them should be present, but the two organizations were so antagonistic and hostile that my efforts to bring about a conference between them were unsuccessful.

This being the case, I asked this official of the National Association of Manufacturers to write me a letter setting forth the views of his association touching this bill, and at my meeting with Mr. Gompers I read this letter. At the close of the reading, he said:

> That letter expresses the views of the American Federation of Labor exactly, and it states them better than I could state them myself.

I think this fact is worthy of being especially emphasized. Here are two organizations which, so far as I know, disagree upon every or almost every other point. They represent conflicting interests in the labor world, and yet on this vocational education measure they are in entire and hearty accord; and from one end of this country to the other the associations which represent the great industrial interests of our land are sending me letters and telegrams approving this bill and assuring me that if it passes it will solve better than any other plan before the American people at this time one of the most vexatious economic problems that now confronts us.

Let me quote very briefly from the views of Mr. Gompers, representing the American Federation of Labor, and Mr. Miles, representing the National Association of Manufacturers. Mr. Gompers says:

> Under this proposed law the Federal Government, the States, and the local communities would be united in a cooperative movement to place within the reach of every boy and girl in the country the opportunity of securing both a general and a vocational education.
> The prosperity of a nation depends upon its industrial and commercial success, and in respect to these success depends upon the training and intelligence of its citizens. It is therefore plainly evident that a national educational system determines its destiny.
> The compilation of statistics relating to the period of school attendance by the young of the country, the study of these statistics, and the result of the limited attendance of so large a proportion of the school population which they have desclosed have attracted the attention not only of men engaged in educational effort, but the people generally. The fact that so large a proportion of the boys in the United States are leaving school at or before the completion of an elementary course of instruction, that the major portion of them are subsequently to earn a living by the work of their hands, that at an early age they seek employment largely in unskilled industries because they are fitted for nothing better and because they are too young to enter upon the work of apprentices, even were that possible, and that the prospects of emergence from unskilled to skilled industries is so small, is attracting attention to the problem and demanding solution.

Mr. Miles says:

> The need of industrial education is coming to be seen in all quarters, and the movement has a tremendous impetus. The purpose of the Page bill is not to develop engineers through technical schools, etc., but to educate the boys and girls who are going to earn their own living in factories, stores, etc., and as wives of our working people.
> This money (the money appropriated by this bill) would be spent in continuation schools, evening schools, and in day schools for boys and girls of about 14 years of age and over. This would be the first appropriation to make happy and efficient and educated in a measure to their life work the children of the common people who live in the cities and towns.
> The Page bill likewise recognizes the other half of our population, those who live by agriculture, by giving about the same amount for agricultural and the domestic arts, not in the high-grade schools that turn out experts, but in the common schools, where are educated the boys and girls who will be the real farmers of the future. Not one dollar has ever been given educationally to the factory boys and girls, and this bill proposed that it shall now be given.

I think very few Senators have ever stopped to consider the magnitude of this great proposition and the millions upon millions of people which it would favorably affect from ocean to ocean and from Canada to the Gulf.

Mr. President, the nations of the earth are now engaged in a race for commercial supremacy, and in that race to-day Germany is confessedly taking the lead. It is said that she annually exports a billion dollars' worth of her products, and this fact is, in large measure, owing to that other fact that she is more progressive in the matter of industrial education than any other nation in the world. In Germany every boy, even to the sons of the Emperor, must learn a trade. Japan has recently adopted an educational system. She studied the educational systems of the world and then adopted the German system. Men like to do what they can do well, and no boy entering any manufacturing establishment can do his best work if he understands that his equipment for that work is so inferior to those with whom he is associated that he is at a disadvantage.

The boy does not stand still; he is either progressive or retrogressive. Inspire him with faith in himself, and he puts forth his best efforts to succeed. We all work better under encouragement and inspiration than under the lash and spur.

To learn more is to earn more. If the boy could have discovered this fact before being thrown upon his own resources as he passed from the grammar school, he would have put forth his best efforts to secure a vocational education. But this fact was not pressed home to him. Indeed, under existing school conditions the opportunity to learn more about the practical things of life does not exist, and it is one of the main purposes of this bill to bring into existence schools which will give the average boy the equipment which his restless, progressive nature demands and which he, as a prospective citizen of this country, is entitled to receive.

I dislike to seem to criticize our school methods, because I recognize that a multitude of our wisest and best men are unselfishly and patriotically devoting themselves to the education of the young men and women of our land.

That they are doing good work is shown by the fact that during the last decade the ratio of illiteracy has decreased from 10.7 per cent to 7.7 per cent, or, to state it differently, it was 39 per cent higher in 1900 than in 1910.

Have we not too long assumed that the mere school definition of illiteracy is misleading? Have we realized what a small part of our people are vocationally trained? Have we not stopped with teaching our youth the three R's? Have we taught them to make use of their elementary training in gaining knowledge and skill in the great vocations open to more than 92 per cent of them? Have not our educators been asleep as to the latent cultural power and value of the body of knowledge in the great major vocations of the farm, the shop, and the home?

But I submit, not as a criticism but as a suggestion for the consideration of the Senate, that there is something wrong in a school system which drives the average boy away from school life at the very time when he should be just beginning to realize the great importance of education. It is absolutely futile to argue that it is the boy's own fault. If there is any criticism to offer upon our system of education it is that the curriculum repels rather than attracts the average boy, and, worse still, the father of the average boy.

Mr. President, we shall never change this condition, in my judgment, until we introduce into our school system a greater or less measure of vocational education. To just what extent this can be done is a problem which we must work out. It is a problem which our educators, as they to-day look upon the school curriculum, will not solve except by slow and tedious processes unless something is done to stimulate and point the way substantially as is contemplated by this bill.

Unless Senators have given the matter some thought, very few of them realize the extent to which training along industrial lines can be made to contribute to a general cultural education. We all remember how our boys were given abstract problems in arithmetic when they were young. They learned to add, subtract, multiply, and divide. But if the men who prepared the arithmetics for those boys had known that they were going into a machine shop after leaving school, and if they could have provided an arithmetic which would have been just as well suited to give the boys a cultural education and at the same time equip them with a practical knowledge, this change of textbook would have been of incalculable value to them when they went into the shop.

I have before me an example of problems found in a textbook published by the General Electric Co., of Schenectady, N. Y. This company assists in the training of boys who are to find work in its shops later on. Let me read two or three of the problems which they give to their students:

If a hollow cylindrical casting is 3 feet long and 1.5 feet inside diameter, and 2 feet outside diameter, what will be its weight if cast iron weights 0.26 pound per cubic inch? What will be the cost at $2.25 per hundred?

If in finishing we take a cut one-fourth inch inside and one-fourth inch outside and sell the metal turned off at 50 cents per hundred pounds, what is the final cost of casting?

The arithmetic of this company is full of concrete problems like the two I have cited. In brief, the cultural is attained through the vocational, and who can say it is not a wise change?

In seven States—Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Michigan, and Wisconsin—recent laws have been enacted relating to vocational training for the industries, and Massachusetts has a commission on industrial education.

Under her law enacted in January, 1906, 17 independent industrial schools were organized prior to January 1, 1910. This law is believed to be one of the best, and I ask consent to publish it as an appendix to these remarks, as it may be of assistance to those who would study the practical workings of industrial education.

The underlying principle of this Massachusetts law is that those who reap the benefits of the appropriation shall contribute a share of the expense. The law, among other things, provides that the Commonwealth shall repay to any city or town one-half the expense of these schools. I quote one section of the law:

Upon certification by the board of education to the auditor of the Commonwealth that a city, town, or district, either by means raised by local taxation or by means donated or contributed, has maintained an independent industrial school, the Commonwealth, in order to aid in the maintenance of such schools, shall pay annually from the treasury to such cities, towns, or districts, a sum equal to one-half the sum raised by local taxation for this purpose.

Mr. President, at one of our hearings before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, Mr. Herbert Myrick, president of the organization which publishes the Orange-Judd agricultural papers, at Springfield, Mass., appeared before us and exhibited a chart giving the money value of industrial training as shown by the Newark Technical High School, at Newark, N. J. I confess that the figures seemed to me so absolutely unbelievable that I did not wish to give them to the Senate as facts without having them verified, so I wrote to the principal of the school, quoting Mr. Myrick's statement. His reply was that in the main the statement was correct. Here is the statement:

The so-called skilled mechanic in the industries of New Jersey earns fifteen to twenty-five dollars per week, but let the same adult mechanics spend their evenings for a while acquiring technical training and industrial education and so greatly is their capacity developed that at the age of 45 they occupy positions that pay an average of $66 per week.

This is the actual result of the census taken of the graduates of the Newark (N. J.) Technical High School, which is an evening school. These are mechanics who work at their trade during the day and come in and attend evening classes. I have, from what I believe to be good authority, the information that this result was obtained from an actual canvass of the graduates of this Newark Technical School for a period of years, and that the replies received covered 85 per cent of those who had graduated.

Whether the replies to the other 15 per cent would materially change the proportion upward or downward, I am unable to say. In any event, it could not change it very much. Let me repeat that the average so-called skilled mechanic received from fifteen to twenty-five dollars per week, while these graduates from this Newark Technical School averaged $66 per week, thus showing that the men who were sufficiently enterprising and ambitious to take the training at this school rose to positions as managers, foremen, and overseers.

In passing, let me refer to one point in connection with this school, because it illustrates how I hope this bill will work out with reference to the separate schools for the trades and industries provided for in section 4 of the bill. There are, in round numbers, 1,600 towns and cities in this country having a population of 4,000 or more.

Let us suppose for a moment that every one of these should avail itself of this appropriation, and let us suppose that the $3,000,000 which section 4 appropriates is matched by a State appropriation in each State, making $6,000,000, and then that these cities shall add thereto as much more by local taxation, making $12,000,000 in all.

This would mean an average of $7,500 for each school. Educators say that it takes $100 per capita to conduct a good school of this kind. This means that these schools would have an average of 75 scholars each, and that these 1,600 schools would annually send out to infuse new life into our manufacturing industries approximately 120,000 trained men.

You will observe, Mr. President, that I have predicated my conclusions upon the hypothesis that local taxation will supplement and match the Federal and State appropriations.

Bearing upon this point, I wish to say that the law of New Jersey, under which the Newark Technical School was established, provides that whenever any board of education, school committee, or other like body in any city, town, or township in the State shall certify to the governor that a sum of money not less than $3,000 has been raised, it shall be the duty of the governor to cause to be drawn by warrant on the comptroller an amount equal to that contributed by the particular locality for the said object, and when any school or schools have been established in any localities aforesaid there shall be annually contributed by the State for the maintenance and support thereof a sum equal to that contributed each year by said locality for said purpose, provided, however, that the moneys contributed by the State to any locality shall not exceed in any one year the sum of $5,000.

It will be observed that the State of New Jersey helps those who help themselves, and that is what this bill designs to do. It really is an offer on the part of the Federal Government to share with the States in making offers of funds to those cities and communities which will help themselves.

Mr. H. E. Miles, chairman of the committee on industrial education of the National Association of Manufacturers, in an address on vocational education, speaks of America as being likened to a huge stevedore bearing down to the ships of the sea the crude or semicrude material for the use of the capital, labor, and intelligence of foreign nations. These exportations are a depletion of our national resources, the heritage of the ages, and are irreplaceable. We now see that under present processes those resources will be exhausted within a period that to the farsighted is as a day. We sell our cotton to Switzerland at 14 cents per pound with scarce any labor in it; we buy it back in the form of fine handkerchiefs at $40 per pound, nearly all labor.

The extent to which we may change these conditions by increasing the efficiency of the rising generation through industrial education will measure the degree of prosperity and progress which this country is in the future to enjoy in its struggle for commercial supremacy.

No nation approaches us in inventive genius, none in natural push and vigor; and if we will stop thinking in small sizes for a brief period while we start on an upward trend the generation now coming upon the stage of action, by the use of that efficiency which comes from a better and more practical education, we can distance the world.

The official figures just issued by the Census Bureau show that we increased our manufactured products from fourteen billions in 1904 to twenty billions six hundred million in 1909—a gain of 40 per cent in five years. We increased the number of our manufacturing establishments from 216,118 in 1904 to 268,491 in 1909. We increased the capital invested in manufacturing these products $5,700,000,000 in these five years. We increased the number of our wage earners 21 per cent in that time, and, best of all, it may be said that while we increased the number only 21 per cent, we increased the wages 31 per cent.

Dr. Schwedtman, president of the Citizens' Industrial Association, of St. Louis, says:

> We have every reason to be gratified with our showing; but the greatest value of past records of patriotic, progressive, and ambitious men is this—they provide a standard for the future. Standing still is impossible. We must go backward or forward. The record of the past five years must be surpassed by that of the next five years.

But, in his judgment, we now strike an economic fact which must be carefully considered. He says that while in the past much of our industrial growth has been accomplished by increase of industrial territory, increase of raw material, and added immigration of skilled foreign mechanics, we must look for our future progress principally to higher efficiency in our shops, to higher grade of output, to a better grade of American mechanics. We must export less pig iron and more sewing machines, less steel billets and more watch springs, less copper and more dynamos.

It has been truly said that the man deserves well of his country who makes two blades of grass grow where one grew before. Is this not equally true of men who turn raw-cotton exports at 14 cents per pound into fine handkerchiefs at $40 per pound?

Mr. President, only 38 per cent of the population of the United States are breadwinners. Fifty-five per cent of the Austrian population, 53 per cent of the Italian population, and 48 per cent of the French population are breadwinners.

We must convert the idlers of this Nation into producers; and, in my judgment, we may do so if we will take the hundreds of thousands of boys, now almost running wild in our larger cities, and, by industrial education, by instruction along the lines of the trades and industries, and by finding them places to labor, turn them from vicious paths into self-respecting, self-supporting, contented producers.

In England the percentage of population engaged in manufacturing, mining, trade, and commerce is 64; in the United States it is only 40. Is it not our duty to provide for this additional 24 per cent of our population by converting them from consumers to producers?

The United States produces approximately 5,500,000,000 pounds of cotton annually, but we manufacture only 2,000,000,000 pounds of that cotton into finished products. England produces in India 1,350,000,000 pounds of cotton, but she manufactures approximately 2,250,000,000 pounds into finished articles. If we figure raw cotton at 15 cents per pound and finished cotton products at 30 cents per pound, we have a difference of $525,000,000 annually which might be paid to skilled workers in the United States, which now goes to the skilled workers of England and other countries.

We appropriate millions of dollars every session the benefits of which are largely local, but the benefits of the appropriations flowing from this bill will reach every city, town, village, and hamlet, and practically every child resident therein. And yet, Mr. President, the time will never come when the appropriations under this bill will aggregate at their maximum more than 1¼ cents per month per capita of our population.

In 1916 our population will be more than 100,000,000, and if the total appropriations under the bill at that time were to reach $15,000,000—and they will not—it can be seen at a glance that the per capita expense to the American people under its provisions would be only 15 cents per annum. Think of it, Mr. President. We shall have given to every one of the sons of the toilers of this country an opportunity to acquire an education, which shall make us a Nation of more efficient producers, of more self-respecting, more contented, more happy men and women, and consequently a Nation of better and more law-abiding citizens, and that, too, by an annual appropriation from the National Treasury of only 15 cents per capita of our population.

HOME ECONOMICS.

Mr. President, I shall now devote a few moments to the question of home economics, although I have given to the subject a somewhat less extended examination, perhaps, than I ought to be qualified to speak interestingly upon it.

I have, however, proceeded far enough in my investigations to become fully satisfied that the education of our girls along the lines of the trades and industries and in home making as contemplated by this bill is one of the most important economic problems now before the American people.

Mr. President, I have never taken pains to figure out just what part of the funds appropriated by this bill would be used for the benefit of home making, but I have asked prominent educators how they thought the bill would work out, and they have expressed the opinion that of the nine millions appropriated—three millions for the separate schools in cities, three millions for the industrial schools connected with the high schools, and three millions for the district agricultural schools—about 25 per cent would probably find its way into the field of home economics for the education of girls.

Home economics or the science of home making is a much more comprehensive term than one would believe who has not given the matter some thought. Broadly speaking, it refers to the improvement of the conditions of home life, but the avenues through which this improvement comes are many.

Primarily they include cooking, sewing, making articles of household use, vegetable gardening, home nursing, care of children, and so forth.

But these are only the elementary studies, and the girl who would fit herself to be a true home maker should understand the preparation of foods for invalids, first aid to the injured, the value of foods that enter into daily consumption, and how to buy them so as to eliminate waste. She should understand ventilation, hygiene, physiology, the prevention of preventable diseases, serving of dinners, laundry work, house planning, millinery, making her own clothing, art needlework, household decoration, household bookkeeping. Indeed, her studies should cover that broad field which will fit the girl to prudently and economically manage household affairs when she becomes a wife and mother, and to have such an understanding of household administration as will enable her to eliminate waste and plan prudently, as one must do who provides for and presides over the household and has to do largely with the family living expenses.

Mr. President, the difference between the girl who leaves school on the completion of the seventh or eighth grade without any knowledge of these practical affairs of life, and the one whose school life has been prolonged for an added year or two in the study of home economics is very often the difference between success and failure as a wife and mother.

A good, well-kept home, presided over by an intelligent woman, educated along both general and practical lines, means health, happiness, prosperity, with healthy children and all those essentials which make life worth living.

The country is fast awakening to the fact that probably 50 per cent of all divorces would have been avoided had the girls been good cooks, good home makers, and good mothers. The country is also awakening to the fact that infant mortality is largely owing to lack of that knowledge touching motherhood which ought to be better understood in all our homes.

Fifty years ago every girl believed her proper calling in life was to become a good home maker, wife, and mother. To-day they look forward to a position in some trade or industry, or, perhaps, to office work as stenographers, typewriters, or telephone girls. And when—as is usually the case—they find themselves brought face to face with married life and the home, they fail to bring to the discharge of the wifely and motherly duties that experience, skill, and knowledge so absolutely essential to a good home maker.

The picture is an unpleasant one, Mr. President. It is one which affords no gratification to a student of public affairs. The results are that in too many instances home life is unendurable, and year by year more and more do the divorce courts show the results. We must give our girls a training different from that with which we now provide them, for if we do not, and if race suicide and divorces continue to increase as they have for the past 25 years, our social conditions will become unbearable.

What greater problem confronts us to-day than the health of our people, and especially the health of the young? And who does not know that it is only by that better knowledge of sanitation, hygiene, cooking, and ventilation gained by an education in home economics that we can give the rising generation a higher standard of health and physical force? We must come to realize that a sound mind in a sound body is one of the essential prerequisites of wholesome, forceful manhood or womanhood.

I rejoice in the fact that home economics is rapidly assuming the prominent place which it deserves in all schools which girls attend, from the elementary to the collegiate. This bill, if it passes, will generally accelerate this essential movement toward better home making, and mothers who are bringing up the rising generation in conformity with the laws of health will be accorded a higher status in the social ranks of American women.

It is a most regrettable fact that by far too large a portion of our American girls are not good housekeepers and are lamentably ignorant of the duties of motherhood. We might profitably consider this great proposition along other and collateral lines, including the great question of race suicide, but I hesitate to discuss this problem here. A mere reference to it ought to bring a blush to the cheek of every student of our social conditions.

Mr. President, the American School of Home Economics has very forcefully expressed its disapproval of our great economic waste in the matter of our home management. It says that $10,000,000,000 are expended annually in the United States for food, clothing, and shelter, when, with greater knowledge and efficiency, better satisfaction could be obtained and $1,000,000,000 saved for higher things.

Half a million lives are cut short and 5,000,000 people are made ill by preventable diseases every year. With universal knowledge of hygiene and sanitation nearly all deaths and illness from such causes could be prevented.

Six hundred thousand infants under 2 years of age end their little span of life yearly, while millions of children fail to reach their best physical development, because their mothers and fathers do not understand how to care for them in the light of science. With more knowledge at least half these babies could be saved and the physical standard raised immeasurably.

I will ask permission at this point to insert a clipping from the Washington Post of June 4, 1912.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection permission is granted.

The clipping referred to is as follows:

200,000 LIVE BUT A MONTH—OF BABIES WHO PERISH YEARLY, 15,000 ARE BORN IN NEW YORK.

Two hundred thousand infants die every year in the United States before completing the first month of life, of which number 15,000 are born in New York City. This statement was made to-day during a meeting called to start a new campaign of infant welfare in this city.

It was decided to call a meeting for next Monday afternoon, to which will be invited representatives of all hospitals, dispensaries, and similar institutions in New York.

It will be proposed that there be established a central office in the health department building, which will be a clearing house for all work intended to aid infants. This will not interfere with the integrity or independence of any one of the individual organizations.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, thousands of homes are wrecked, tens of thousands of lives ruined, and hundreds of thousands are made unhappy because the home-keepers of our country have no training in that greatest of all professions, the "profession of home making and motherhood." All must live in some sort of a home, for everyone finds his chief happiness there. Character is developed there. No great advance, spiritual or mental, is possible which does not begin with the home. The home makers of America have the making of the Nation. Every girl is a potential mother. Every mother should be a home maker. Every girl should have the best of health, some knowledge of her peculiar functions, some specific preparation for playing her part in the best possible home.

Society must come to recognize that woman's work is to promote the best possibilities of the next generation. Let us at least be as sensible with reference to the health of the woman who bears the child as we are with reference to the breeding of stock.

There is such a close connection between home economics and the education of women for industrial pursuits that we hardly know where one leaves off and the other begins; but this bill provides education for them in both relations. The young girl in the city must not only earn a livelihood at some manual trade, but must broaden somewhat her field of general knowledge. This she is able to do by the separate industrial schools provided for in section 4 of this bill. Indeed, it is presumed that the appropriation made by section 3 for a separate division in the village high school will afford the girl who must earn a livelihood after she leaves the grammar school and before she becomes a wife a fair equipment for such branches of special service away from the home as she may find it necessary or convenient to enter. That this special training for the girl works out practically is shown by the examination of some of the schools which have undertaken this class of work.

For instance, the Manhattan—New York City—Trade School for Girls began its work in 1902 under the inspiration of a group of men and women interested in philanthropic, sociological, economic, and educational work. They found upon examination that the wages of unskilled female labor were declining, while those of skilled labor were advancing, and that the supply of skilled labor was inadequate. They reached the conclusion that the condition of the young and inexpert working girl must be ameliorated in some way.

The principles of the school, as laid down by its organizers, were to improve the worker physically, mentally, morally, and financially; to better the conditions of labor in the workroom, and to raise the character of the industries and the conditions of the home.

It was not expected that immature girls of 14 or 15 years of age would, immediately upon entering the labor market, make large salaries, but the purpose was to educate these girls for situations for which their qualifications best fitted them, and to make possible a steady advance to better occupations, better wages, and a better life.

Here is just a brief statement as to five of the different occupations taught at this school and the improved financial change which resulted:

In dressmaking the girls started at $3 to $5 per week; after training in the Manhattan school they were able to earn $5 to $12 per week. In millinery the girls started at $2.50 to $4 per week; after training they received from $4 to $10 per week. In operating machines the girls started at from $3 to $6 per week; and after training they received from $5 to $20 per week. In novelty work the girls started with wages from $3 to $5 per week; after training they earned from $6 to $10 per week. In what is known as "trade art" the wages of the girls at the start were from $5 to $8 per week; and after training they increased from $8 to $15 per week.

These schools in New York have what are called "night continuation classes," and an examination shows that the classes are not only well attended, but that the results are excellent.

The cost of equipment of schools to teach these subjects is relatively not large. As regards garment or dress making, it is estimated that a room for 20 workers may be plainly furnished at a cost of $300 to $500.

The equipping of a workroom for electric power operating, including general and special machines, motor, cutting and work tables, cabinets and chairs, is, of course, considerably more expensive than one for garment making. In the latter, one sewing machine can be used for several workers, but in electric operating each worker must have her own machine. The electric motor adds also to the expense. The minimum cost of thus equipping a shop for 20 workers is about $1,000 to $1,500.

Arthur D. Dean, chief of the division of vocational schools of the State department of education of New York, says:

We are only at the beginning of a new conception of woman and her work. She will be educated only as she is master of herself and master of her job—master of herself in the sense that she must know of her possibilities as a woman of splendid health, of personal power, and of genuine poise; master of her job only as she is fitted for a God-given motherhood and a community-given vocation.

Charles Wagner says:

The more a woman shall have learned to live by herself the better she will occupy her position in wedded life should she marry. Trained to direct herself, to earn her own living, capable of energy and decision, a woman, if she marries, brings a precious cooperation to her husband. If she never marries she will know how to be all-sufficient to herself. She will not believe her life lost nor make of it a morbid matter.

I believe Senators make a great mistake when they underestimate the benefits which will flow from that part of this bill which pertains to home economics. I have become intensely interested in it, and the more I study it, the more I think it is one of the great features of this bill.

GOOD CITIZENSHIP.

Mr. President, I wish I might say that no Senators were objecting to this bill, but I can not. There are a few who urge its expense as sufficient reason for opposing the measure, while others urge its unconstitutionality. The latter insist that there is no warrant in the Federal Constitution for the cooperation of the Federal Government with the States in matters of education, and for this reason say this bill should not pass.

I am not a lawyer and speak only as a layman, but it seems to me that if there is any one matter upon which Congress—and, indeed, the great American people—have passed repeatedly and affirmatively, it is the question of the constitutionality of Federal aid to education.

In discussing this matter of constitutionality with a Senator who has had a very long experience in congressional life, he made this answer to my suggestion:

Senator, I did believe that if any State wished to secede from the Federal Union it had the constitutional right to do so. Perhaps I might truthfully say that I so believe at this time, but this matter was decided in 1865 once and for all time. The question of the constitutionality of Federal aid to the cause of agricultural and industrial education was decided in 1862. That decision has been again and again reaffirmed. I have no desire to reopen the question at this time.

During the Sixty-first Congress, acting in conformity with a demand from the American people which was simply irresistible, we practically went into the banking business by establishing postal savings banks and borrowing money from the American public to reloan to the banks of the country. No one has claimed that there is any express warrant in the Constitution for this legislation, but the measure is meeting the approval of the American people, and no one to-day thinks of repealing the postal savings bank act or of raising the question of its constitutionality.

It seems now probable that, acting in conformity with a demand that is almost equally irresistible, we are about to go into the express business through the medium of the parcel post, and I imagine that if that accessory to our Post Office Department shall prove to be a financial success no one will be heard to question that legislation because of its unconstitutionality.

Mr. President, if there is any act upon our statute books to which the people of this land have given their most hearty approval it is the Morrill Act of 1862. Congress has reaffirmed that approval again and again, first by the Hatch Act of 1887, appropriating $15,000 annually to each State for experiment stations, then by the second Morrill Act of 1890, giving an additional $25,000 annually to each State for the benefit of the agricultural colleges established by the original Morrill Act. It was again reaffirmed in 1906 by the Adams Act, which doubled the appropriation under the Hatch Act by giving an additional $15,000 annually to each State for these same agricultural colleges and State experiment stations; and no later than 1907 it was further reaffirmed by what is known as the Nelson amendment, offered by the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota, by which was added another $25,000 per annum to the agricultural college fund of each State. These four appropriations supplemented the original Morrill Act by giving to each State $80,000 per annum additional.

Remember that the original Morrill Act was passed in 1862, at a time when we were in the throes of the Civil War, and when the burdens of the Government were infinitely larger than they are to-day. We took our new departure on these lines then and decided that the general welfare was so dependent upon industrial and agricultural education that we might well lead the way in that great work.

The new departure taken in vocational education in 1862 has worked wonders in the way of giving to the country an army of trained specialists in agriculture, engineering, and home economics. This skeleton army has laid the foundation for the larger, broader work which by this measure we seek to accomplish. Without these trained specialists we should be in a condition of unpreparedness which would be absolutely deplorable. As it is, we are now ready to go on with the broader work; and the great American people now insist that we do go on with it in some such manner as is outlined by Senate bill No. 3, now before us.

Mr. President, I do not think I can be mistaken in regard to the attitude of the country with reference to the better education of our boys and girls along agricultural and industrial lines. I wish Senators might have been associated with this work as I have been during the past 14 months, for I am sure if they had been they would realize more fully than they now do the intense interest which prevails throughout every section of the country, East, West, North, and South, on this great question.

This movement for vocational education is not confined to any one section nor to any class of people, but has taken deep hold upon our agricultural, our commercial, and our manufacturing population. There is scarcely an important organization in this country, which has for its object the uplift and betterment of our people, that has not considered this particular bill—Senate bill No. 3—and, by specific resolution, approved it, usually in its entirety, but always as to its fundamentals. There is scarcely one of the great educational organizations of this country which has not passed upon this bill, and, barring some of its administrative features and some of the difficulties of its articulation with State laws, approved it unqualifiedly and enthusiastically.

It occurs to me that there is no impropriety in reading to the Senate the resolutions of a few of the more important of these organizations and associations which, in convention, have made this bill the subject of debate and have passed resolutions indorsing it.

The National Grange is one of the most important organizations which speaks for agriculture. It is the recognized mouthpiece of a very large body of the farmers of this country. At its annual meeting at Columbus, Ohio, last fall, it passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the National Grange, in its forty-fifth annual session assembled, does hereby indorse the Page bill, Senate bill 3, to provide for vocational education in secondary schools, the training of teachers for these schools, agricultural extension, and agricultural demonstration.

The International Dry Farming Congress is an organization whose special field of labor is in the semiarid regions of the trans-Mississippi States. I am told by Senators from the intermountain States that the organization is helping to successfully solve the great dry-farming problem which is being worked out to-day in those sections of our country which have very little rainfall.

That congress at its annual gathering at Colorado Springs in October last unanimously adopted the following resolution with reference to Federal aid for industrial education:

This congress reiterates the conviction voiced by former congresses in favor of financial Federal aid for rural education and agricultural extension, the same to be expended exclusively by the several States in the interests of agriculture, home economics, and the mechanic arts, and for preparing teachers for the same. * * * This congress urges upon its members that they use all legitimate influence to the end that the coming session of the Congress of the United States may witness the enactment into law of a comprehensive plan for agricultural and vocational education and training in the common and high schools.

While this dry-farming congress makes its special work the improved methods of tilling arid lands, its members interest themselves generally in those educational matters which are supposed to be for the general welfare.

Among the subjects especially considered by that congress was that of woman's work—the home and home economics; and since this constitutes an important feature of this bill, I wish to read the resolution of this organization touching home making:

Realizing that the results of agricultural education during the past two decades have demonstrated the equal importance of the education of the farm women along parallel lines with the education of the farmer, and also realizing the importance of the carrying forward of agricultural propaganda, in so far as it relates to the establishment of happy, contented homes on all farms, * * * this congress heartily indorses the bill now pending before the United States Senate which provides for a permanent annual appropriation to each State experiment station for the purpose of conducting original or confirmatory experiments dealing with the whole field of home economics, and requests our respective Senators and Representatives to urge this bill for early passage.

There is a very strong organization in the South, known as the American Education and Cooperative Farmers' Union, and another—of perhaps equal or greater strength—the American Society of Equity. It is said that the two together represent several million farmers.

I do not know how they compare in importance with the National Grange, but I imagine that they are to the South what the National Grange is to the North. I shall not read their resolutions, but will simply state that at the joint meeting of these two organizations they passed resolutions approving the provisions of this vocational education bill and earnestly urged the Members of the National Senate and House of Representatives to favor its passage.

The International Congress of Farm Women is another organization which is quite active in some sections of the country, and at their last annual gathering they passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That this congress indorses the vocational-education bill now pending in the Congress of the United States, whereby the States and Nation may combine in a comprehensive plan of effective vocational training in secondary schools, through which the rural elementary schools may be benefited.

The National Association of Manufacturers is one of the strongest organizations in this country devoted to the improvement of industrial conditions. It is constantly entering new fields of labor in a philanthropic way. At its last annual meeting held in New York City it passed the following resolution with reference to industrial education:

That this association earnestly devote itself, with reasonable outlay of funds, to the promotion of industrial education, to the end that such education may be made available, as soon as possible, to every child who needs it.

Resolved, That we favor the establishment in every community of continuation schools wherein the children of 14 to 18 years of age, now in the industries, shall be instructed in the science and art of their respective industries and in citizenship.

The National Educational Association, at its convention held in Boston some time ago, passed the following resolution, by a unanimous vote:

That while the members of this association are of the opinion that the old courses of study, which had as their chief object the giving of culture to the individual and of transmitting to him the best ideas and ideals of the past, should in no manner be weakened, we nevertheless, very sincerely indorse the movement to make the courses of study offered in our schools more democratic, that they may meet the conditions of our modern commercial and industrial life. However, to meet adequately these new demands imposes upon the schools of the country additional financial responsibilities, and this association appeals to the Nation and to the States for more liberal appropriations for educational purposes in order that this additional work in agriculture, in the trades and industries, and home economics may be effectively undertaken.

The Southern Educational Association, a very important factor in educational life in the South, covering the Southern States, at a meeting at Houston, Tex., unqualifiedly indorsed this bill.

I have stated that agricultural, industrial, labor, and manufacturers' associations are demanding the passage of this bill. I might add that boards of trade, federations of women's clubs, the National Metal Trades Association, the National Association of Builders' Exchanges, the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, the International Typographical Union, the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations, and a very large number of other National, State, and local associations, have indorsed this measure.

They cover all sections of the Union, and I shall take great pleasure in showing them to any Senator who feels interested to know the attitude of organizations in his own immediate section of the country. If there is any association connected with or especially interested in educational work anywhere in this country which does not earnestly and enthusiastically indorse the great principle of vocational education sought to be worked out by this bill, I am not aware of it.

It is not best that I further take the time of the Senate by quoting from resolutions and lettters from distinguished educators and others, showing that the country is thoroughly alive to and very deeply interested in its support of this great educational measure; but, with the consent of the Senate, I will include them as an appendix to my remarks.

Let me say in passing that they cover every State in the Union, and collectively they show beyond doubt or question that the American people are in favor of immediate action by the National Congress on this important measure, and, in my opinion, they will regard any longer delay in legislation providing for cooperation between the Federal Government and the States as utterly inexcusable and not in the line of true economy.

Mr. President, the great mass of our people are insistent that something be done about this matter, and be done now. The field is already white for the harvest. I believe it is not an exaggeration to say that more than 95 per cent of all the letters received by me—and they number several thousand—are earnestly commendatory of the fundamental principles of the bill, and that as a whole they regard the measure more pregnant with importance to the welfare of the American people than any other of the many general bills involving constructive legislation now before Congress.

It has been said that the greatest act of Abraham Lincoln's life was the emancipation proclamation, and that second only in importance was the signing of the Morrill agricultural college bill. If objections on the ground of centralization, paternalism, and unconstitutionality were relegated to the past in 1862, there are a hundred times as many reasons why we should cease to plead those objections now, for while, as statistics actually show, the Morrill Act tends to give higher education to less than 2 per cent of our boys this bill directly affects 92 per cent.

But, Mr. President, in my judgment there is an argument in favor of this bill which places it upon infinitely higher grounds than any that have been urged or that can be urged for the postal savings bank, the parcel post, or for the Morrill Act, and that is the promotion of good citizenship.

The laboring men of this country, including the farmer, feel that their sons are not receiving that equality of opportunity in the struggle for life to which they are entitled. They believe that taxes are levied which call upon them for a disproportionately large expenditure of money. They also believe that these expenditures are too largely for the benefit of the 1.71 per cent who enjoy a college course or the 5.35 per cent who complete only the high-school course, while the other 92.93 per cent are most unfairly neglected.

Our school statistics not only show that but 8 per cent of the children of school age ever reach the high-school grade, but also that only 25 per cent of the balance ever reach the eighth or highest grade in the elementary or grammar school. Why this is so, I will discuss later. For the time being I state the plain fact as a justification for the other fact stated, to wit, that the men comprising our so-called working class feel that in some way or other and for reasons which they can not understand a great wrong is being perpetrated upon them and their children.

That those comprising this class are justified in viewing the matter from this standpoint, I think will be admitted by every Senator who will take the trouble, if he has never done so before, to recall the conditions actually existing in the vicinity of his own home, as these conditions are substantially alike in every section of the country where mining, quarrying, and manufacturing bring together aggregations of laboring men.

The pupil struggles along through his first six grades of elementary school life, and then for some reason he begins to dislike his school. Thomas A. Edison, the great electrician, in speaking of this matter recently, gave voice to a thought which we might all well consider. He said: "My boy is an average boy, but he hates his school life."

Mr. Edison was stating a concrete fact, touching his boy, which applies equally well to probably 75 per cent of all the boys in the eighth or highest grade of the elementary schools. They hate the school, and they plan and figure in every possible way to avoid a continuation of their school life.

Mr. President, there is something wrong here, and we, as legislators, must not shut our eyes to that wrong, because it is pregnant with an importance, in my judgment, second to no other problem now before this Nation. To continue conditions longer as they now are is to criminally neglect the largest asset of this country, the American youth.

I do not wish to criticize either the judgment or the conscience of that great body of highly educated men who stand at the head of our educational work, and who are rendering a noble service in giving us the highly trained minds that are annually graduated from our higher institutions of learning.

I do not wish to be misunderstood in this matter. If we could send our boys and girls through high school and to the college, I should feel that we had almost reached the millennium. But we can not do this, and I believe I voice the sentiment of hundreds upon hundreds of the more thoughtful educators and publicists of our land to-day, who give it as their opinion that the curriculum of the elementary or graded school is largely impracticable and does not fit for the great struggles of life that are before them the 92 per cent of our boys and girls who never pass beyond the eight grades.

I believe that when the child reaches the seventh grade we should begin to take an account of stock of what that child is. He should be studied physically, mentally, and psychologically. The natural bent of his mind should in some way or other be brought out; and when we have discovered what that bent is, we should continue his education along practical lines, and in the direction of his natural abilities, for as many years as his conditions and needs warrant, that we may make of him an efficient worker in some useful line.

As it is to-day, he looks from the elementary school to the curriculum of the first year of the high school, and there he discovers Latin, French, geometry, algebra. He goes to his father and mother and lays his troubles before them. He says to them, "I don't want to learn French, I don't want to learn Latin, I don't want to study algebra. They will never do me any good." Nine times out of ten the father believes with the child, and opportunities are too often given him by the parents to avoid school life, even during the last or eighth year of compulsory attendance, and as soon as he has completed the eighth grade he takes final leave of school.

The father then says to his son: "John, you must this year earn enough to pay for your own clothing and to provide your own spending money, and you must pay your mother a dollar or two a week toward your board." With this injunction the boy starts out, and, following the lines of least resistance, he is fortunate indeed if he does not find himself in that class in which statistics tell us that more than 40 per cent of the American boys in our large cities land, viz, in the class of errand boys, bootblacks, and newspaper vendors.

What is the result? Evil associates surround and control the boy during the two or more years of this most impressionable period of his life, and on arrival at the age when he is permitted to enter upon an apprenticeship or take up some employment he finds that his environment has been such as to weaken every higher moral quality. Instead of there being a growth for the better from the fourteenth to the seventeenth year, he has actually been allowed to degenerate; whereas, had these years been spent in part in some vocational school where he was learning the fundamentals of that trade or calling which he has elected to pursue, he would not have found himself where he must, on entering the workshop, take his place alongside the cheapest, lowest illiterate from some foreign land.

Men like to do that which they can do well. Place a boy in a position where he must work in the lowest grade of the establishment with which he is connected and work to him is drudgery. Give him such work as a year or two of education along vocational lines would have permitted him to do and all is changed. He sees not only a higher wage, but he sees promotion, preferment, and honors. The boy who has been drifting downward from the fourteenth to the seventeenth year soon comes to know that he has not had a square deal in the race of life, and he joins the order of malcontents and anarchists.

Educators are practically unanimous in the belief that every proper incentive should be used to continue the school life of the boy after he reaches the eighth grade by another year or two at least; three to five years would be better still. But this we can never do under our present system of education. Indeed, Mr. President, there is but one opinion to-day touching this matter, and that is that only by holding out both to the father and to the boy the great, practical advantages to be derived from vocational training—a training that shall equip the boy for the duties of life—may we stimulate, even in a small degree, that much needed extension of his school life.

All are agreed with Edison that the great majority of our boys at the age of 14—at the completion of the eighth grade—hate their school. If we can, by placing before them the benefits of vocational education, induce them to add another year to their school life they would then come to see the necessities of a better education from a broader, higher viewpoint. The addition of one more year of school life would oftentimes mean the still further addition of two, three, or even more years to that life, and that, as we all know, would mean an advantage of inestimable value to the future of the boy.

Industrial education, more than any other agency, will augment and intensify the desire for more knowledge, both general and vocational. It will unquestionably arouse into action thousands of boys possessing latent ability and talent, and with their desires whetted for still greater knowledge every institution of learning now in existence will become the direct beneficiary of the joint action of the Nation and the State in providing, as here proposed, a stable foundation upon which can be builded a broader education.

I state a fact which every Senator knows when I say with reference to the school life of the great majority of the sons of those men who toil in the mills, the workshops, and the quarries, that they are most sadly neglected. The father is usually unable to find employment for his 14-year-old boy in the shop or quarry where he works, and the boy is too young to be sent away.

In support of the correctness of my contention that many boys drift into a criminal manhood when they are turned loose from the grammar school, I quote from Prof. George Walter Fiske, who, in his series of lectures on "Boy Life and Self-Government," says:

> Our reformatories and jails are still filled with mere boys. The maximal age for malicious mischief is only 14; for petty larceny and assault, 15; for crimes against property, 16; while the maximum curve for fornication is at 17. Early and middle adolescence is still the great crime period. The shirking of the average home largely accounts for this boy waste, but the ethical failure of the public school is, to a degree, responsible also.

Judge Merritt W. Pinckney, of the New York juvenile court, says that apparent neglect and incompetence are responsible for most of the delinquency which brought to his court three-fifths of the 12,000 children who have passed through it during his incumbency of that office.

Judge William McAdoo, the chief magistrate of the New York City municipal court, in making his annual report, says:

> There is growing up in this city a menacing army of boys and young men who are the most troublesome element the authorities have to deal with. From the ranks of these lawless, reckless rowdies, who are organized in bands or bound up with chums or pals, come most of the crop of burglars, truck thieves, holdup men, and other criminals and dangerous characters.

Mr. President, this great asset of ours—the American boy—on completing his eighth or elementary grade, is thrown, like the worthless ore from the copper mine, into the dump; or, to state it differently, is turned adrift and allowed to degenerate into a cheap and oftentimes criminal manhood.

One of the leading journals of Canada—the Toronto Globe—in commenting on Judge McAdoo's report, uses the following language:

> This description applies fairly well to many of the older boys and the younger men of all cities, towns, and even villages. Probably the cause is the same in all cases: Physical energy craving for active exercise, mental activity dissatisfied with the perfunctory routine of the graded school, and a tendency to romance, at once nurtured but debased by the criminal ideals presented not merely in works of imagination, but in the criminal records of real life. A very large proportion of youths of the class described by Judge McAdoo are capable of being diverted from their downward careers and developed into an excellent type of law-abiding citizens. Among the various means of reclaiming boys of the class above described none is more effective than the "industrial" school, which makes provision for keeping the body as well as the mind in a state of activity.
> A great educator has embodied a whole theory of common-sense treatment of youth in the simple injunction to "put the whole boy to school." If all schools were what they should be there would be fewer recruits developing into confirmed criminals, less work for the guardians of the public peace, and a finer type of citizenship even among those respectable people who have never needed repentance.
> A great city can not afford to do without an "industrial school" any more than it can do without public schools. Such an institution should have for its invariable concomitants ample room for outdoor exercise and ample opportunity for institutional activity. Book learning is worth cultivating, but it should not be promoted at the expense of manual skill directed to useful ends by trained intelligence controlled by common sense.

This measure purposes to do exactly what Judge McAdoo would accomplish, but instead of waiting until the boy has become a criminal it takes him as he passes from the elementary school and safeguards him during the early period of adolesence.

New York City has apparently awakened to the fact that something must be done, and she has already taken steps to move forward on vocational education lines. She has established a vocational school for boys, in charge of Dr. Charles J. Pickett.

He says, touching his school:

> This school is not the preparation for life; it is life itself. There is no jumping out into the world, there is no break; what a boy does after he leaves school is only a continuation of what he has been doing here. We fit a boy to do something definite, and there is no trouble for him to get work after he leaves. The difference between our boys and those at ordinary elementary schools is that when the latter leave school they look for a job and take anything they can get, while our boys know what they can do and have no difficulty in securing the kind of work for which they are fitted.
> In every possible way is the school identical in form with the actual activities in the industrial world, so that the boy at school feels that he has already gone out into the world.

There is probably no State in the Union more progressive to-day along educational lines than Massachusetts. In 1911 she provided a general system for vocational training and established a State board of industrial education. The executive officer of that board, Dr. David Snedden, has a reputation as one of the great educators of this country, and his reputation is not confined to the Atlantic, but extends to the Pacific coast as well.

He believes that vocational education may be so extended as to include the liberalizing influences of a cultural education. He has—and, I believe, properly—reached the conclusion that since we can not give the boy Latin and algebra, we should adopt a curriculum which, while it teaches the boy the practical things of life, to the end that he may earn a livelihood when he leaves school, shall at the same time give to him a reasonable measure of cultural training.

I want to quote from Dr. Snedden, for it shows that he has caught the inspiration of the present and is not wandering in the trackless forest of the educational past—trackless, because under the conditions confronting us to-day those tracks lead to nowhere, so far as 92 per cent of our boys and girls are concerned. Dr. Snedden thinks we may make the practical at the same time cultural and thus reach the cultural ends while at the same time equipping the boy with a practical education. Dr. Snedden says:

> For many reasons a vital vocational education, resting on concrete foundations and making due allowance for expansion into the related fields of science, art, history, economics, and civics, may became an exceedingly effective means of liberalizing the minds of several types of boys and girls, and especially those least capable of abstract thinking or school idealism.
> The demand for vocational education under school conditions is a widespread one and is rooted in the social and economic changes of the age. Rightly organized vocational education will prove a profitable investment for society.

There is in this country what is known as the National Educational Association. At its national convention held in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1908, this advanced ground was taken:

> The public high schools should not be chiefly fitting schools for higher institutions, but should be adapted to the general needs, both intellectual and industrial, of their students and communities. Fully realizing that trained and skilled labor is a primary essential to the industrial and commercial welfare of the country, we cordially indorse the establishment by municipal boards of education of trade schools and evening continuation schools, and further recommend that the instruction in these schools be practical and efficient and have the advice and approval of the trade interested, to the end that graduates of these schools may at once become advanced apprentices or journeymen.

Anyone who has given serious consideration to the broad question of school curriculum can not have failed to observe that the men at the head of our State educational boards are largely graduates of universities. They have believed, and I share in that belief, that it is wise for every boy to have a college training. The curriculum of practically all our schools looks forward to the college as the ultimate end of all school life. Every college-bred man regards it a great misfortune that our young men are not receiving a more generous cultural training, and so do I.

But, Mr. President, these men forget that only 1.71 per cent of our boys ever enter the college or university. They forget that only an additional 5.35 per cent ever enter the high school. They forget that only 25 per cent of the balance ever get as high as the eighth or upper grade of the elementary or grammar school. They forget that less than 50 per cent ever complete the seventh grade.

In brief, Mr. President, they predicate their plans for the school life of the boy upon what ought to be rather than what is. They would have every boy thoroughly educated, so would I, but since this can not be, let us be practical. Let us not forget that much as we would have it otherwise, the school life of the American boy must of necessity be so changed as to teach him how to get a living.

Mr. President, it is not easy to estimate the advantages which will come into our country life by the passage of this bill. Teachers of agriculture and home making will be prepared in large numbers by the agricultural colleges and the State normal and other training schools. The secondary school department will provide in the local schools the beginnings of vocational education.

The district agricultural schools will send back to the farms hundreds of thousands of boys to join with the father, who meanwhile has been educated by the farm or college extension work provided for by the bill; and together they would join in vitalizing, stimulating, and energizing that more intelligent and more profitable farm management of which our country to-day stands in such great need.

The extension work will furnish instruction and inspiration to millions of our mature farmers. The present splendid movement for the betterment of country life will be impelled forward at a faster rate. The aspirations of our best people to live on the land will be aroused. We shall see the genetically best of our great white race again seeking the land instead of deserting the country for the city.

Mr. President, I think I am naturally optimistic. I do not share the opinion that any one man or any set of men can destroy this Government or for any protracted period retard its prosperity. Our people are too intelligent and too patriotic, and in the end, whatever policies may be followed, wise counsels will prevail and a generous measure of prosperity will continue.

If, however, I were called upon to state what, in my judgment, was the most threatening omen of the future, I think I should say the industrial question.

There is, in my judgment, only one way to remove this great spirit of unrest, and that is by giving to the sons of our laboring men an education along industrial lines. Do this, and we shall make them more self-respecting, more law-abiding, and, I hope, more patriotic citizens. Failing to do this, I fear the red flag of anarchy will eventually be hoisted.

It is not the trampling of the American flag under foot, as was done recently in New York City, that is disquieting, but rather the fact, which this trampling evidences, of a deep-seated hatred for this Government on the part of an increasing number of our population.

We are receiving into the body politic a larger quantity of material of difficult digestion than it can assimilate. The immigrants arriving in this country during the month of March, 1912, were 83,654, as against 75,306 last year. We can stand this influx only by so educating the next generation that we may assimilate them into our political system. The sons of these men who come to us from southern and eastern Europe are anxious to learn, and to their credit be it said their parents are willing to make sacrifices to an extent that American perents seem oftentimes slow to make.

I believe it is within our power to so legislate that all our people, or practically all, may have an honest occupation—a vocation, an opportunity to earn a livelihood, an opportunity to obtain, through pleasurable labor, the wherewithal to supply the legitimate, reasonable, frugal demands and desires of mind and body.

There are only two alternatives connected with this great problem—first, to close our doors against immigration, or, second, to see to it that the children of those whom we permit to come from foreign shores are given an education that will fit them to earn a respectable livelihood. Since it is the policy to permit immigration, we should combine with that policy the industrial educational features of this bill.

Give the children of these immigrants an education along vocational lines, so that they may see that their condition is bettered because of their change of residence to the United States, and they will love our institutions, love our country, and respect our flag.

Deprive them of such an education as will make them efficient and permit them to earn a respectable livelihood and we may well fear that the red flag of anarchy will take the place of the Stars and Stripes. Educate these foreign boys and they are a blessing; omit to do it, and they become a menace. Which shall we do?

Disraeli, in speaking of the temperament of the French people, said:

> What the French people want is bread and a circus—bread with which to fill their stomachs, and a circus to amuse them.

The American people want, most of all, occupation, and at wages which will give them bread and enable them to give their children an education that will equip them for the struggles of life.

Mr. President, we must not do injustice to the laboring man. Out of the abundance of our great wealth and our great prosperity we must at least see that his children have the opportunity to receive an education, and that kind of an education, too, which shall fit and equip him to be self-respecting and self-supporting, to the end that he may take his place alongside of his more favored brother.

We must so combine the advantages of the city and the country that more of our best people will live on the farms; and, with larger and stronger families, they can help our race to gain that world leadership which can only be attained by a combination of large numbers with a high average of industrial efficiency.

Mr. President, the occupied man is a good citizen. It is easy for the agitator to call the idle man to deeds of violence and anarchy, but the agitator is not able to lead the honest arm from the anvil and the plow into deeds of destruction.

Wise statesmanship lies in so administering our affairs as to give the greatest measure of universal contentment.

National defense is just as effectually provided for in promoting good citizenship as in building battleships. An illiterate, uneducated citizen, disloyal and anarchistic, as he oftentimes is, is a greater menace to our national safety than the combined battleships of Great Britain, France, and Germany.

Mr. President, parsimony is not necessarily true economy. There is that which withholdeth and yet tendeth to poverty. Sound economy, in my judgment, demands the appropriations called for by this measure. If enacted into law, we shall find within the next 10 years that, instead of proving to be an expense, it will prove an investment which will return to us five, ten, or even twenty fold from an economic standpoint; and if considered with reference to that greatest of all our assets—the American boy and girl—it will prove an investment which will pay returns in the form of happiness, contentment, and efficiency that reach to the infinite.

Kant, the philosopher, once said that there were two things which overwhelmed him with awe as he thought of them. One was—

> The star-sown deep of space, without limit and without end; the other was right and wrong. Right, the sacrifice of self to good; wrong, the sacrifice of good to self.

"Opinions alter, manners change, creeds rise and fall, but the moral law is written on the tablets of eternity."

If in doubt as to our true pathway concerning the right and justice of this problem, let us make equity and duty our guiding stars.

Mr. President, in our efforts to be prudent let us not be unjust. We must not be parsimonious in the treatment of this great question, for it is not only an economic but a moral and an ethical problem. Dollars and cents should not be placed in the balance over against right and duty in considering this movement for the benefit of the sons of those who toil on our farms, in our mills, our mines, our workshops, and our quarries.

Let us not, Mr. President, as we pass through the wilderness, keep our eyes so closely fixed upon the manna that we fail to behold the exalted peaks of Sinai.

APPENDIX.

INDORSEMENTS OF THE PAGE BILL FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

ALABAMA.

J. A. Wilkinson, commissioner of agriculture and industries, says:

> We of Alabama are very much interested and concerned about vocational education, and we believe that the time is at hand when the Federal Government should move in this direction.
> I believe that if the Federal Government would make an appropriation and lead the States in this movement this would be one of the wisest steps that could possibly be taken by our great statesmen in Washington.

James K. Powers, president State Normal College, Florence, says:

> I have read the bill with interest, and hope to see it passed at an early day.

J. W. Watson, A. B., president of the first district agricultural school, Jackson, says:

> I am heartily in favor of the vocational educational bill which is now pending in Congress, and I sincerely hope that it will pass. The progress of vocational education is very much retarded because of lack of funds; in fact, as I see and understand the situation in the States, very little progress can be made along agricultural and industrial lines until Congress comes to our rescue and gives us an appropriation.

Mr. Walter S. Buchanan, president State Agricultural and Mechanical College, Normal:

I have read with interest the entire bill and several comments on the same, and I much prefer your bill and hope it will pass. I think it the best thing that has been before Congress in several years.

Mr. James K. Powers, president State Normal College, Florence:

I thank you for recent favors with copies of the Page vocational education bill (Senate bill 3) and advising me of its status.

I sincerely trust that you will be able to push it through substantially as it is—certainly with all branches of the work provided for.

ARIZONA.

Mr. A. J. Matthews, president Tempe Normal School of Arizona, Tempe:

I thank you for the bill relating to assistance for agricultural instruction from the United States Government. I am much interested in it just now, and it is a very pertinent question at the present time. We are just about to adopt an elementary agricultural course in connection with our normal school, as we have 600 acres of excellent land, and should your bill pass we would undoubtedly be benefited.

I agree most heartily with your stand for broadening the application of Federal assistance for agricultural education, and in no place can this work be more emphasized than in the State normal schools where teachers are prepared for the public schools. It seems to me that the very root of the matter is reached through our schools. If teachers are competent and enthusiastic in such work, they have an opportunity to arouse an interest in the homes of the grammar-school pupils, which represent the great mass of the pupils of our public-school system.

I congratulate you upon the far-reaching benefits of the proposed measure and trust that it will be made a law in the near future.

Hon. Richard E. Sloan, governor of Arizona, Phoenix:

I have carefully gone over your bill and have consulted with some of our leading educators as to its provisions, with the result that I heartily commend the general plan outlined for the establishment and maintenance of agricultural high schools, to be supported jointly by the Federal and State governments. Vocational training more and more is claiming the attention of educators, and wisely so, in my judgment, so that your plan is in line with this general movement and puts agriculture upon an equal footing in this regard with other applied sciences. The practical value of agricultural courses in high schools is apparent, and if our agricultural colleges are to do work of the highest quality and breadth, they should be supplemented by such preparatory courses in the high schools.

We have made a start in this direction in Arizona, and although the amount which shall be apportioned to our State under your bill is small, still it will be a help and an encouragement to receive any substantial sum from the National Government to be extended in this behalf.

I sincerely trust your bill may receive the support it deserves and that it may become a law.

Mr. A. H. Wilde, president University of Arizona, Tucson:

I am much interested in the contents of your letter and hope earnestly that your bill will yet pass.

R. H. Forbes, University of Arizona, Tucson, says:

Replying to yours of December 4, allow me to express my heartiest appreciation of the motives actuating Senate bill No. 3, a copy of which you have just forwarded me.

ARKANSAS.

George B. Cook, State superintendent of public instruction, Little Rock, says:

I regret it is impossible to attend conference, but send hearty indorsement of Page bill and assure you of most cordial cooperation of the Arkansas department of public instruction and myself personally. This measure specifically recognizes the most important duty that rests upon the Nation as well as upon the individual, community, and State, the duty of training for citizenship through public schools.

J. J. Doyne, president Arkansas State Normal School, Conway, says:

No measure that has been presented for years, it seems to me, means so much to the rapid advancement of those measures so vital to the prosperity of our country.

Victor C. Kays, State Agricultural School, Jonesboro, says:

This bill is one of vital interest to the farming people, not only of the South, but of the whole country. On our farming people depends the prosperity of the rest of our population. Heretofore the farmer has received little recognition along the lines of instruction from the Federal Government. When we compare the expenditure for the uplift of the farming people with those which have been made for other classes of our population and for other purposes which are not constructive in their nature, the sums meted to agriculture and the mechanic arts seem to be a mere pittance. The people throughout this State are thoroughly alive to the benefit to be derived from aid of this sort, and they are watching the acts of their Representatives with a great deal of interest to see that every effort is put forth for the passage of this bill, which seems to us to be best adapted to our needs at the present time. It would seem, with the proper direction of the efforts of our statesmen who are interested in benefiting the condition of the agricultural community, that this bill should become a law.

Mr. C. F. Adams, dean and director College of Agriculture, University of Arkansas, Fayetteville:

The Page bill meets with my personal ideas and is wholly adaptable to this State.

CALIFORNIA.

Edward Hyatt, State superintendent of public instruction, Sacramento, says:

Please count me in to do everything I can in my bailiwick for the Page bill. You are free to quote me to any desired extent as favoring the bill and being ready to further its interest in all legitimate ways.

Mr. Jesse F. Millspaugh, president California State Normal School, Los Angeles:

Important as it is, agricultural education, if given in colleges and universities only, will never popularize the farm or develop widespread interest in rural concerns. With well-supported agricultural colleges in every State to develop the science and establish foci for its extension, the high schools and the normal schools must carry this gospel to the people, and particularly to the boys and girls, of the Nation if its teachings and spirit are ever really to infect the population.

I believe that no more important educational measure has ever been proposed than that which is contemplated by the Page bill. It is said that, with the exception of the emancipation proclamation, the most far-reaching act of President Lincoln's administration was his signing of the Morrill bill establishing our national system of agricultural and mechanical colleges. The Page vocational bill, when enacted into law, will take its place in history as the natural supplement of that great achievement and of equal importance to it.

Mr. G. W. Shaw, College of Agriculture, University of California, Berkeley:

It is my firm opinion that the passage of the Page bill will mean more to the country than two-thirds of the money which is spent in various engineering projects, and that it is a move in the right direction. It has my hearty indorsement, and I sincerely hope that Congress may pass the bill as it stands.

I shall certainly give you all the assistance possible in urging the passage of a measure which is so vital to the agricultural and industrial interests of the country.

M. Lillian Trimble, department of home economics, Mills College, Mills College post office:

The Page vocational education bill, to which you have recently called my attention, receives my heartiest approval. It will inevitably raise the standard of living of the masses through instruction in the use of resources. I want to commend you and your coworkers for your activity in promoting a measure so full of promise.

Mr. E. W. Hilgard, College of Agriculture, University of California, Berkeley:

I have received and perused with great satisfaction the bill introduced by you for the purpose of aiding the States in establishing instruction in agriculture in the schools. This is a matter about which I have spoken and written for the last 35 years, being convinced that agricultural colleges established under the Morrill Act will never be able to attain their full usefulness in educating teachers and leaders of progress until instruction in agriculture is introduced into the elementary and intermediate schools. They have been charged with "educating boys away from the farm," where, as a matter of fact, it is the public schools fashioned upon a schedule applicable to the city children which alienate them from the farm, since in no way is their attention directed to farming, except by hard work at home. The nation-wide movement now on foot for correcting this evil is what I have been hoping for all of my life, and I welcome most warmly the initiative taken by you in giving national aid to this important subject, provided the States will do so themselves.

Mrs. Nellie W. Hunt, secretary California State Grange, Napa:

Your letter under date of March 2 is before me. After having read over the literature which accompanied this letter, I can assure you that the bill meets with my entire approval.

I have mailed the literature to the chairman of our committee on education, who I know will give it his very earnest consideration, and be prepared to bring the matter to the attention of our State grange at the proper time.

COLORADO.

Mr. Z. X. Snyder, president State Teachers' College, Greeley:

I had been interested in Senate bill No. 3 by Senator PAGE ever since its first introduction into the United States Congress. I do not know of anything that the United States Congress could do that would so directly aid in the development of the general intelligence of the people through an educational process as the passage and carrying into effect properly this bill. Education for efficiency must, first, train an individual to earn a living to secure and own a home; second, to be of service to others in making life better and richer; and, third, in having an abiding interest in the development of our institutional life, as the home, the school, and the State. These mark the efficiency of the school system. Our school system has not been such as to attain these ends. It seems to me this bill will lead more directly to it than any other means apparent at the present time. I am heartily in favor of it; the people of the State of Colorado are in favor of it; the State Teachers' Association and the Educational Council of Colorado have made a report in favor of it; the State institutions of Colorado have given a report in favor of it—indeed, there are none against it.

At a meeting of the Colorado Teachers' Association a resolution formally indorsing Senate bill 3 was adopted, and at a later meeting of the Educational Council of Colorado the committee on vocational instruction made a report strongly favoring the enactment of Senate bill 3 and indorsed the action of the Colorado Teachers' Association.

CONNECTICUT.

Mr. Henry T. Burr, principal State Normal Training School, Willimantic:

I have carefully read the report on vocational education and the bill which accompanies your letter of February 29. With the objects of this bill I am in entire sympathy. I sincerely hope the bill will pass.

The need of greatly extended opportunities for vocational education is felt by nearly everyone who is connected with the schools. It seems to me that the matter is of great importance to the country at large, and I believe that Congress would be altogether justified in appropriating money for the purposes noted in this bill.

Mr. Howell Cheney, member State board of education, South Manchester:

I agree with you most decidedly that education for the encouragement of the trades and industries has not had its fair share of public support, which certainly can not be said of the agricultural schools.

Charles L. Beach, president of the Connecticut Agricultural College, Storrs, says:

I am heartily in favor of the passage of a bill in aid of agricultural extension. The results from an investment of this character promise large returns, and I trust that the present Congress may take favorable action upon this important measure.

DELAWARE.

Mr. Harry Hayward, director Agricultural Experiment Station, Delaware College, Newark:

I have your letter of February 16, inclosing a revised copy of Senate bill No. 3, known as the Page bill. I have examined this bill with some care, and it will be a pleasure for me to exert all my influence to secure its passage. I am confident that I also speak for the State board of education, as well as for the trustees of this institution, when I say that I hope the bill will pass during the present session of Congress.

I hope that you will have no difficulty in getting your bill through, as I believe that it is the most comprehensive measure of its kind ever presented to Congress.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Clarence J. Owens, secretary-treasurer of the Southern Commercial Congress, Washington, says:

The Southern Commercial Congress, through its executive officers, has approved the Page vocational education bill now pending in the Senate. Without sectional or political motives, the Southern Commercial Congress has been named by friends of this measure as the national headquarters for the advocacy of the passage of the bill.

Dr. Myers, principal of the McKinley Manual Training School at Washington, says:

After considerable study of the subject, with particular attention to Germany, which is far ahead of other countries in training for the industries, I am forced to the conclusion that a satisfactory system of industrial education in this country must include a working over of the elementary school curriculum in such a way as to make the industrial activities of the community the vitalizing factor in it.

Dr. William Davison, newly elected superintendent of public schools, District of Columbia, says:

I am in favor of working out further the idea of introducing vocational subjects into the curriculum of the schools. People are beginning to realize that boys and girls must be taught to earn a living and that they can not spend their entire time in studying so-called classical subjects. All children must be educated on their ethical side and must be taught about the higher things of life, but they must also be taught that they must support themselves and be given lessons in how to earn money. Our schools should be well balanced, with both these ideas kept well to the front. I have just written a letter giving my hearty indorsement to the Page bill, known as Senate bill No. 3. I am exceedingly pleased to know that you have received such an unqualified and hearty indorsement of your bill from the State superintendents of the public institutions throughout the country.

Mr. Myron Germain Jones, director of education in the Washington Young Men's Christian Association, says:

What private initiative has amply attested as wise and needed; what careful investigations of educational leaders, economists, and captains of industry have clearly shown to be the new demand if we are to be a nation of producers; what States like Minnesota, Iowa, Ohio, and Massachusetts have already done in consolidated rural schools and in trade-training systems related to local industry, would all go to demonstrate the desirability of enacting the provisions of this bill into our Federal scheme of education, and that without delay.

The educational work is democratic and Christlike because of its humbler aims—humbler as regards culture, per se, but vaster as regards humanity. It aims not, like the university, to reach and teach a maximum of knowledge and truth, but to evolve the maximum of individual manhood; to reach down to the man who has not had a chance, to help him up, to put his feet on the first step he can now reach, to help him upward, stair by stair, as he is able to advance, not necessarily to the highest reach of truth and knowledge attainable by man, but to the highest attainable by this man practicable for him; to make his life the greatest, richest, and most helpful it can be made within his span of being.

The Evening Star, Washington, says:

The rural educational problem is one that has long been neglected. It is also one of the most important problems of the present day. Fifty-five per cent of the population of the United States live in rural districts and in small villages. Sixty-five per cent of the children are there. In many parts of the country we still have the one-room school, where the teacher is supervisor, principal, superintendent, and teacher all in one.

Too many boys are being turned loose in the world to live in a makeshift way; turned loose without any one desirable thing having been well enough learned to make a living at it. A good brick mason is surer of a comfortable life than an indifferent lawyer and is a bigger factor in the upbuilding of the world.

Mr. A. P. Bourland, of the board of trustees of the Peabody Educational Fund, Washington:

I shall be obliged if you will have sent me 20 copies of the bill encouraging instruction in agriculture, along with 20 copies of the Report on Vocational Education. If you will let me know of any specific service I can render, I shall be gratified. I am finding no opposition to the bill.

FLORIDA.

William Halloway, State superintendent of public instruction, Tallahassee, says:

The State department of education and the friends of education throughout Florida are strongly in favor of the passage of the Page bill.

J. J. Vernon, dean of the College of Agriculture, University of Florida, says:

The Page bill—Senate 3—is both practical and comprehensive. It is the best bill yet offered having for its purpose the training of the sadly neglected masses. It is socially and economically sound. Congressional action is necessary to draw out backward States. The action of Congress is urgently needed. I indorse the Page bill.

Mr. W. B. Cate, principal Florida Normal Institute and Commercial College, Madison:

I have just read Senate bill 3, known as the Page school bill, and heartily approve of it.

GEORGIA.

M. L. Brittain, State superintendent of education, Atlanta, says:

I feel a great interest in the Page bill. It seems to me that the measure proposed is directed toward a vital need. It so happens that, through the concentration of wealth in urban localities, the child in the city and town receives from 2 to 10 times as much educational assistance as the one on the farm. This, too, despite the fact that we are all dependent upon the results of the work of those engaged in agriculture.

I earnestly hope that the bill will pass, and that in this way more help may be given to each State to promote rural life and prosperity.

Southern Machinery, Atlanta, says:

That industrial education has assumed national importance and is attracting attention throughout the United States is shown by a bill recently introduced in the Senate by Senator CARROLL S. PAGE, with a view to Government aid to the States in promoting a better system of education along agricultural and industrial lines and in home economics. The bill as it stands at present may not be entirely satisfactory in every respect, but the subject is worthy the best thought of the Nation. Industrial education has been tried in a comparatively small way and found to be helpful. It has passed the experimental stage and bids fair to become one of the most important branches of public instruction.

Hon. G. Gunby Jorden, president board of education, Columbus, says:

From a long experience in manufacturing and in farming, together with continued service for several years as a trustee in one of the State schools of agriculture in Georgia, and as president of the board of education of Columbus, Ga., I have had opportunities in forming a very decided opinion upon the necessity for vocational education in the United States. I have never had occasion to change my views as to the great necessity for Federal aid in this regard.

A thorough training of the youths of this land in industrial, agricultural, and vocational work would save untold millions, wasted now in senseless strikes and pitiless lockouts, by a better and saner acquaintance between capital and labor.

The Federal Government, in my opinion, dealing equitably and fairly with all the States and Territories in this regard, is not only well within its constitutional rights but could make no appropriation of money which would so soon, so thoroughly, and so lastingly benefit the people.

Mr. H. J. Pearce, president Brenan College Conservatory, Gainesville:

I have read with considerable interest your bill which you have had the kindness to send me, and I am entirely in sympathy with the general plan proposed.

Mr. J. D. Wood, secretary the Atlanta Builders' Exchange, Atlanta:

We are pleased to acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 19 in reference to the Page bill now pending in the Senate, and to say that the same will have the hearty approval and support of the Atlanta Builders' Exchange.

IDAHO.

G. M. Shepherd, State superintendent of public instruction, Boise, says:

It may please you to know that at a meeting of the Idaho State Teachers' Association, held January 4 to 6, the association passed a resolution urging our Representatives in Congress to do all in their power to pass Senate bill 3.

I sincerely hope the bill will pass Congress at this session. I am particularly desirous that it pass at this time, so that at our next legislature we may pass laws in harmony with the Page bill. The greater part of our State is agricultural and we need schools such as the bill makes possible. Too long has our educational system been at fault in that it did not prepare our boys and girls for useful citizenship. We need to educate them for the farm and the trades rather than away from them.

I hope a few narrow-minded people who are always crying expense will be able to see that this is one of the greatest and best pieces of legislation for the welfare of the Nation that has ever been introduced.

We will be glad to assist in any way we can to secure the passage of this bill.

Mr. Earl S. Wooster, dean rural department, Lewiston State Normal School, Lewiston:

I am very glad to state to you that I am heartily in favor of the general purpose of the Page bill, and trust that nothing will stand in the way of its passage. I shall be very glad indeed to do anything within my power to assist in the passage of this bill.

Mr. G. A. Axline, president State Normal School, Albion:

During the past six weeks either myself or members of my faculty have attended meetings of the public-school trustees of Fremont, Bonneville, Bannock, Lincoln, Twin Falls, Blaine, Owyhee, and Elmore Counties. In each one of these counties the trustees expressed a strong desire for vocational education in the public schools. You are right in believing that the people are demanding vocational education, and I believe that it will be a mistake for their Representatives in Congress to neglect this demand.

I readily appreciate the fact that men who do not come in as close contact with the patrons of the public schools as I do may not be aware of the very rapid and strong growth of public sentiment toward vocational education during the past four years. I am quite certain that there are many Congressmen who would vote in favor of your bill if they understood the real situation who now are opposing it because they do not realize the demand of the people for a legislation of this sort.

Mr. L. C. Aicher, superintendent Aberdeen Agricultural Experiment Station, University of Idaho, Boise:

I am heartily in favor of your proposed bill and shall do all I can to further its interests.

There is no question but what the passage of such a bill would cause a wonderful stimulus to the industrial, agricultural, and vocational work of our great country.

Mr. J. S. Welch, superintendent Gooding Agricultural Experiment Station, University of Idaho, Boise:

Have carefully read copy of Senate bill No. 3 and am glad to give it my hearty indorsement. Hope that it may pass both Houses.

Mr. E. J. Iddings, department of animal husbandry, University of Idaho:

I have your favor of some days ago in regard to the Page bill for extending aid to the agricultural colleges. I have looked over the bill and earnestly hope that its provisions may be enacted into law. Agricultural education is immensely popular, and the great trouble in forwarding the movement for better agriculture is that we have not enough trained men to handle the work and are woefully deficient in funds for experimental work, demonstration work, teaching, and for carrying out other functions of the agricultural colleges and experiment stations. I wish to extend my support for whatever it may be worth toward the cause represented by the Page bill.

ILLINOIS.

Hon. C. S. Deneen, governor of Illinois, says:

Since acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 11th instant I have read the bill inclosed, and I am in sympathy with its provisions concerning the introduction of vocational instruction in the public schools of the secondary class. These provisions are in harmony with the suggestions and recommendations of our State educational commission, which has just completed a codification of our school laws and the preparation of courses of study in agriculture, manual training, and domestic science for use in these schools, as well as in the country schools of the State.

With the general purpose of the bill to further the introduction into the public-school system of the States of education in the practical arts and sciences I am in hearty accord.

Edwin G. Cooley, former superintendent of the Chicago public schools, says:

America's resources, though great, are not infinite, and we must learn the lesson of efficiency in work if we are to maintain our place. We can become a true democracy only when we are as much concerned about training a good blacksmith as we are about training a good lawyer—when our system of schools offers equal opportunities to all.

Mr. Frank M. Leavitt, associate professor of industrial education in the University of Chicago, says:

The purpose of the proposed legislation seems to be to provide well-rounded vocational courses as well as general preparation for agriculture, trades, and industries, and home making suited to the respective sections of the United States. It includes encouragement for those permanently engaged in these vocations, and "not necessarily graduated for elementary schools," by the establishment of short, practical courses. It purposes to promote earlier interest in the scientific study of these fundamental human activities by giving appropriate instruction in specialized normal courses. The movement to furnish an adequate education for the agricultural and industrial workers of the country is now well under way, and renewed interest would certainly be stimulated by the passage of the Page bill. The bill deserves the careful reading and, we believe, the active support of those who hope for the rapid extension of free public education.

The editor of the Farm Home, Springfield, says:

This office will take great pleasure in aiding you in any possible way in the passage of the bill.

The editor of the American Bee Journal, Chicago, says:

I am in hearty accord with your effort and trust that it may be successful.

The editor of the Farmers' Review, Chicago, says:

I consider this measure along the right line. There is no doubt of the need of greater activity along this line for our public schools. It should be included in every school curriculum.

Mr. David Felmley, president Illinois State Normal University, Normal:

For several years I have been watching with great interest the gradual evolution of what is now known as the Page vocational bill. In this normal school we are now maintaining strong departments of agriculture, manual training, and domestic science. Nine teachers are now employed in these branches exclusively. We shall be glad of the additional funds that the bill promises for further development of this department. This institution is thoroughly committed to training teachers in the so-called vocational branches, and we heartily approve of your bill, especially of the provision for the aid to State normal schools.

Mr. D. B. Parkinson, president Southern Illinois State Normal University, Carbondale:

Your favor of recent date received. I am very grateful for a copy of the complete bill relative to the special provision for the department of agriculture and home economics. I am personally very much interested in this bill and was glad to be present in St. Louis this week when the normal-school section indorsed said bill, a notice of which will doubtless be sent you. From my point of view, the provisions of the bill are most excellent and will be of great benefit to the country. I most earnestly hope that it soon may become a law.

Miss Mary D. Chambers, Rockford College, Rockford:

I have read your bill with nothing short of enthusiastic delight. My only wonder is that provision has not been made for the teaching of these subjects years and years ago. We have been following the stars and their courses in our educational curricula and ignoring the things that make for human welfare.

It is needless to say that the success of this measure has my heartfelt wishes.

Mr. L. B. Eidmann, lecturer Patrons of Husbandry, State Grange of Illinois, Mascoutah:

I heartily indorse the bill and shall use my influence to aid in the passage of the same.

INDIANA.

Hon. Thomas R. Marshall, governor of Indiana, Indianapolis:

I have read with much interest the document touching the Page vocational bill. I have never been quite sure whether it was the duty of the General Government to furnish higher education; but if it is, I am quite sure it could put money to no better use than vocational training. The farmer and the skilled mechanic will soon be as great a curiosity in America as the stone man if something be not done to render labor not only honorable, but attractive.

Charles A. Greathouse, State superintendent of public instruction, says:

The measure you are supporting is certainly a valuable one.

IOWA.

Albert M. Deyoe, State superintendent of public instruction, Des Moines, says:

I wish to thank you for a copy of Senate bill 3. I heartily approve of this measure, and wish to assure you that you may depend upon my support in bringing about its passage.

I believe that encouragement and assistance from a national source would be a great incentive to the promotion of vocational training in all the States. I believe there is no issue of more vital importance in the United States to-day than the matter of constructive legislation along educational lines.

H. H. Seerley, chairman national committee on agricultural education and president of the Iowa State Teachers' College, Ames, says:

The education of the whole people is so important and the training of teachers to do the work is so imperative that the United States should have a hand in the business. The State superintendents and the State normal schools give their enthusiastic support to the Page bill. It ought to be treated as one of the greatest measures of this age, as it means the betterment of the whole country.

Appropriations thus made will help the people to be self-reliant, self-directive, and self-supporting, and in the end bring returns in citizenship and in prosperity that can not be estimated. The making of this measure into the law of the land would produce a revolution in educational lines that would create a new era of enterprise and progress.

Our present legislature is passing a bill that will introduce to a limited extent agriculture and domestic arts into at least 100 high schools during the coming year. This will be a step in the right direction, but the problem involves matters of such great importance to the country industrially that such slow procedure is hardly satisfactory.

I trust that the National Government may see fit to become cooperator in educational advancement as well as in other lines already so thoroughly indorsed.

G. F. Curtiss, of the Iowa State College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, says:

I am pleased to give the bill my hearty indorsement. The public-school system of America is lamentably weak in failing to make provision for this kind of education. The United States can not hope to hold a leading place among the industrial nations without the training of young men for efficient service in industrial work.

This problem lies at the foundation of industrial prosperity in all sections of our country, and the passage of this measure is of vital importance and ought not to be long delayed.

J. F. Monk, of Tobin College, Iowa, says:

We sincerely trust that you may be able to secure the legislation of this character, for a comparatively small investment along these lines will certainly bring immense returns in the future.

The editor of Pierce's Farm Weeklies, of Des Moines, the Iowa Homestead, Wisconsin Farmer, and Farmer and Stockman, says:

We are greatly interested in this matter, and intend to comment quite liberally upon your bill in an early number of Pierce's Farm Weeklies.

The editor of the Creamery Journal, of Waterloo, says:

It seems to me that you have struck a very important line of work. There is no question whatever but that the Government should take an active part in this great educational movement, and you may count upon us for support.

The editor of Successful Farming, Des Moines, writes:

The prosperity of the world depends on successful farming, and successful farming depends upon the rural schools. I hope your efforts will meet with success.

The editor of Kimball's Dairy Farmer, of Waterloo, says:

You are to be most heartily congratulated upon having introduced a bill of such far-reaching significance. Your bill most certainly ought to pass, and you may count upon us to do whatever we can to promote its popularity.

I have been in position to know the need of instruction of this kind. In every village, town, and city there are many young people to whom the public schools are distasteful because they do not offer work that is of vital interest in fighting the battle for bread.

The purpose of such schools is to develop citizens. The courses that are being offered tend to stimulate mental activity and to cultivate an appreciation of literature and art. Both of these are commendable, but they are scarcely sufficient in themselves, and until we give the young people of this country a little training that will help them to provide means whereby they can enjoy these finer things of life we have not done our duty.

There are many boys who find their school work distasteful because it is so largely theoretical. If these same young people could be trained to use the hand as well as the brain, their interest would be intensified and they would continue their school work longer than many are now doing. I can testify to all of the above from actual schoolroom experience.

Another thing that should commend this bill and secure its passage is the benefit that it will be to the agricultural industry. It is a trite saying that prosperity goes on crutches when crops go wrong. Farming is fundamental to national prosperity, but the farms of to-day are different from the farms of 20 years ago, and the farmer of to-day has problems to solve which the farmer two decades ago knew nothing about.

Conservation of the soil is more vital than conservation of any other natural resources. The problems that are meeting the farmer to-day are only a foretaste of those that will confront the farmer 20 years from now. If we are to continue to enjoy prosperity, we must equip farmers of future generations with a knowledge of fundamental principles that will make it possible for them to meet the problems of larger production and better care of land and crops.

The funds which this bill provides for carrying on the work that it outlines should not stand in the way of its passage. They are so infinitesimal when compared with the benefits that are to be derived that they are scarcely worthy of consideration.

If the people of the United States are to continue to hold the enviable position which they now enjoy, they must meet such problems in a businesslike manner. The farmers and taxpayers generally should be anxious to provide for the measure.

Mr. John H. T. Main, president Grinnell College, Grinnell:

I have your letter of February 22, together with Senate bill No. 3. I have read the bill with a great deal of interest and wish to assure you that I thoroughly approve of it. I have always been in favor of Federal appropriations for education. Fifteen million dollars annually for this purpose is small as compared with the money appropriated for some other purposes that seem to many people not so important as the money appropriated for them seems to indicate.

Dr. Francis L. Strickland, president Simpson College, Indianola:

I thank you for sending me the bill on vocational education and the report of the subcommittee of the Senate.

Education, to serve the highest purposes of the Republic, must keep very close to the life of the people. When an educational institution is out of touch with the life of the community in which it exists, its days are numbered. I am very glad that the Federal Government is to cooperate in this big and important business.

Mr. S. A. Beach, professor and vice dean department of horticulture and forestry, Iowa College and Experiment Station, Ames:

I have your favor concerning the Page bill (S. 3). I assure you that this bill has my hearty indorsement and I shall be pleased to do whatever I can to assist in securing its passage.

KANSAS.

E. T. Fairchild, superintendent of public instruction for the State of Kansas, Topeka, says:

I have just received your favor of June 26 and a copy of Senate bill 3. I have read this with much interest, and am glad to state that it seems to me to be a most worthy measure. I am heartily in sympathy with the motto "more books and fewer battleships."

The editor of the Western School Journal, of Topeka, says:

I have looked through the bill, and it seems to me it ought to pass.

The editor of the Missouri Valley Farmer, Topeka, says:

Your bill seems designed to correct a great evil, and the Government may well concern itself about the matter.

Mr. Joseph H. Hill, president Kansas State Normal Schools, Emporia:

I wish to acknowledge the receipt of the report of the subcommittee of the committee on agriculture and vocational education, and in accordance with your request I am very glad to say that I am in general sympathy with the purposes of the bill mentioned.

Mr. R. T. Campbell, president Cooper College, Sterling:

Have read with interest the copy of your proposed bill touching instruction of agriculture and home economics in secondary schools. I am glad to lend my indorsement to the proposed bill, and believe its passage would mean much for the majority of our boys and girls.

Mr. A. M. Ten Eyck, superintendent Fort Hays Branch Experiment Station of the Kansas State Agricultural College, Hays:

I have carefully read the Page vocational education bill. It is a magnificent proposition, which, if carried out, will mean more to this country in the next 10 years in the way of material, industrial, and educational advancement than any brain can now conceive.

The feature which I especially like about this bill is the splendid aid which will be given toward teaching the teachers to teach agriculture and in bringing instruction in agriculture to the masses of the people rather than to the 6 or 7 per cent who are able to secure a college or university training.

I am an agricultural college and experiment station worker. I am spending my life in the work of these institutions. But the Page bill treats our State colleges and experiment stations royally, besides making possible this greater and more important work—the industrial education of nine-tenths of our people who can never attend our higher schools and colleges.

KENTUCKY.

Barksdale Hamlett, superintendent public instruction, Hopkinsville, says:

I have no hesitancy in stating on behalf of the people in Kentucky, and especially those who are alive to educational needs, that we regard this as one of the most important measures before the present Congress, and sincerely hope that it will be passed at an early date and signed by the President. I believe that the passage of this bill, even though the appropriation will be small compared with the other great governmental expenditures, will do more for the cause of agricultural interests than anything that has been done in the past 50 years. I sincerely hope that it will be passed.

J. G. Crabbe, president Eastern Kentucky State Normal, Richmond, says:

I regret that previous engagements prevented my attending conference behalf of Page bill (S. 3). I beg to assure the conference that Kentucky educators believe this bill is vitally important to a broader national view and responsibility as to fitting our children for successful life.

It receives the hearty support of educators throughout the country, and, in my opinion, is a very desirable measure, as the questions involved are among the most important in present-day needs.

The Courier Journal, Louisville, says:

The country is gradually waking up to the importance of vocational education. To put such an education within reach of the masses is a gigantic undertaking. Advocates of the Page bill believe that the measure presents the only practical plan that so far has been devised.

Ellsworth Regenstein, late State superintendent of public instruction, Frankfort, says:

Your letter of the 2d instant, with inclosed copy of Senate bill 3, has been received. The bill meets with my approval, and I shall be glad to cooperate with you in bringing about its passage.

LOUISIANA.

T. H. Harris, of the department of education, Louisiana, says:

I have examined the bill and wish to give it my indorsement. I think it is a good one, and trust that it will pass both Houses. I wish that I could be present in person and render all possible assistance.

Mr. Brandt V. B. Dixon, president department of education and hygiene, the Tulane University of Louisiana, New Orleans:

Your bill in favor of vocational education appeals to me very strongly. I am not prepared to discuss the matter from the standpoint of political considerations, but speaking as a teacher, and especially as a teacher of young women, I approve most heartily of any effort tending to advance the practical and vocational studies.

The great need of modern education, in my opinion, is that it should devote itself to the culture of the will—the constructive processes of the mind—by means of laboratory methods especially. Our young women should be made more resourceful, self-reliant, fitted for success, than they are at present. The same amount of culture can be secured as by the methods now in use. We will, however, need to develop a new race of teachers.

MAINE.

President Fellows, of the University of Maine, says:

By means of assistance proposed in this bill we can accomplish in five years what would otherwise require a century.

Payson Smith, superintendent of public schools, Augusta, says:

I have examined with much care Senate bill 3, which you sent me with a request for suggestion. I fail to note any points whatever in which this bill could be improved. It strikes me that it is so framed that it meets most acceptably the varying conditions of control of the several States. I am certainly much in favor of the enactment of a measure of this kind, and shall be very happy to be of any possible service in promoting its interests.

MARYLAND.

Mr. M. Bates Stephens, superintendent State department of education of Maryland, Annapolis:

I congratulate you most sincerely on having the bill favorably reported. It looks to me like a good omen for its successful passage.

Let me know any time I can serve you in promoting the bill in any way.

B. H. Crocheron, principal of the agricultural high school of Sparks, says:

I am greatly obliged to you for the literature relative to the Page bill, concerning which I am exceedingly hopeful. I, of course, believe in the bill and am doing all possible to bring it before the people. I hope to secure its consideration at the National Country Life Congress to be held at Spokane November 23–29.

Mr. James B. Hessong, secretary Baltimore Chamber of Commerce, Baltimore:

At a meeting of the board of directors of the Baltimore Chamber of Commerce held on the 11th instant a report was submitted by our crop-improvement committee regarding Senate bill No. 3, as amended, now before Congress.

We consider this bill, if passed, will be of great advantage to Maryland, and our board desires to call your attention to same with the request that you support it with your vote and influence.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. M. L. Burton, president Smith College, Northampton:

Senate bill No. 3, with the report of the subcommittee on vocational education reached me in due time, and I have read it with the deepest interest. Of course, it is impossible for me to enter into the details of the actual administration of the bill, but I can not tell you how thoroughly and heartily I approve of the general plan which is involved. I believe there is nothing more fundamental for the American Nation in the future than that there should be Federal aid for agricultural and vocational education. It lies at the very basis of our whole national life. In saying this I, of course, do not mean for a moment that our colleges of liberal arts should be altered or that their ideals should be changed, but merely that alongside of our present educational system there should be fine opportunities for every boy and girl to equip themselves with work on the farm, in the shop, and in the home. I am with you in this matter and appreciate very highly the work you are doing.

Mr. L. H. Murlin, president Boston University, Boston:

I have been quite interested in your bill providing for a Federal appropriation to encourage vocational education. I most heartily agree with the principles involved. I should not want any reflection made upon the old ideal of education—the study of the classics and mathematics—but I quite agree with you that wider educational opportunity should be offered in elementary education.

Mr. Louis H. Buckley, chairman board of trustees, Worcester Trade School, Worcester:

I will be glad to hold myself in readiness to assist you in any way possible in the advancement of the passage of this bill.

I hope that you may be successful in your efforts to enact this bill, which promises so much for the advancement of agricultural and industrial education in our country.

Miss Alice J. Bunce, director Mack Industrial School, Salem:

Have received a copy of Senate bill No. 3 and also the report of the subcommittee on agriculture and forestry.

I most heartily approve of the bill and believe that the passage of such a bill would improve our country's condition and would well repay the money to be spent.

Mr. G. M. Winslow, principal Lasell Seminary for Young Women, Auburndale:

I have been much interested in looking over the bill which you have introduced into Congress for the advancement in instruction in agriculture, trades, and household economics.

For many years our school has been giving special attention to preparing young women for home making; consequently we feel that in this department you are giving a big boost to one of our pet ideas.

No work which we have done has seemed to us more worth while in its results than the help we have been able to give our students in the way of fitting them directly for the work which they are bound to have later.

Your bill if carried through will do the same thing in a broader field. If carried out in the same spirit, this bill will be comparable in its beneficent results to the Morrill bill, which every Vermonter refers to with pride as a work of a fellow statesman.

Mr. James A. McKibben, secretary Boston Chamber of Commerce, Boston:

The committee on education of the Boston Chamber of Commerce has carefully considered Senate bill No. 3, giving Federal aid to education in industry, agriculture, and the domestic arts in the secondary schools of the several States, and believes it to be one of the most important measures which has been before Congress this year.

The passage of this bill would stimulate further efforts in those States in which vocational education is already provided, and it would encourage this important type of education in the States that are now too poor or too indifferent to take the initiative themselves. Above all, it will focus public attention in the best way possible upon the important part in the development of the United States which sound vocational education is certain to play. The bill is so framed as to encourage gradual and sound development of the right types of vocation education.

The measure is so safeguarded that the Federal money is not likely to be wasted; and with such bodies as the National Society for the Promotion of Industrial Education and the National Association of Manufacturers watching the work of the law and aiding the States in carrying it out, there is every reason to believe that the results of this legislation will be far-reaching.

The directors of the chamber at their meeting on May 9 unanimously adopted the report of the committee on education, recommending that the chamber heartily indorse this bill. I trust that you will use your influence in promoting the passage of this bill.

Mr. John Golden, general president United Textile Workers of America, Fall River:

I am taking this means of informing you that, as a member of the executive committee of the National Society for the Promotion of Industrial Education, and also on behalf of the international organization I represent, that I am heartily in favor of the bill introduced in your name bearing on industrial education.

The Weekly Bulletin, Boston, says:

The educational bill recently introduced in the United States Senate by Senator PAGE, of Vermont, is printed in full in this week's issue. The scope of this bill and the good that it is intended to do the young people of the United States is of tremendous importance and shows a policy on the part of Senator PAGE of endeavoring to carry through one of the best measures which this country has ever seen.

Mr. Herbert Myrick, president National League for Industrial Education, and editor of the Orange Judd Agricultural Weekly, at Springfield, says:

Rest assured that not only our periodicals but our entire organization will do everything possible to promote this beneficent bill.

Deputy Commissioner C. A. Prosser, of the State board of education, says:

The vocational school differs from the regular high school in aim, content, method, and social function. The high school gives general training for life; the vocational gives specific training for a definite calling. The difference is organized knowledge with deferred values as contrasted with applied knowledge and immediate values. The method of the high school is abstract and formal; that of the vocational concrete and direct.

The two should not be regarded as competitive, but as parallel institutions, each tapping a different school strata.

The Commercial Bulletin, Boston, says:

The bill introduced by Senator CARROLL S. PAGE, of Vermont, to encourage instruction in agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in secondary schools, is still pending before Congress.

There is no doubt that industrial education is not developed to anything like the extent to which it might well be developed in this country, and if we are to remain in the front rank of manufacturing nations, we must have not only the best machinery in the world, but also the best-trained hands and brains to operate it.

Whether Senator PAGE'S bill will accomplish all that is hoped from it is, of course, uncertain, but it is gratifying to note that the legislative branch of our National Government is devoting intelligent thought to a problem that is as serious and important as any bill that can come before them, as it concerns the welfare and progress of our people.

The Journal of Education, of Boston, says:

A bill of considerable interest to educators, and especially to those engaged in vocational training, was introduced in the United States Senate last April by Senator PAGE, of Vermont. As the bill is framed, it seems to be in shape for final passage, and it is certainly a bill that we should like to see made into a law. Its provisions are generous, and it would stir up all those States that are in need of an incentive along the lines of industrial education and vocational training.

Lewis C. Grandy, editor the Printing Art, Cambridge, says:

We have read with much interest the copy of the bill you recently introduced in the Senate to encourage instruction in agriculture, the trades, industries, etc. There is a great need of the Government undertaking this work.

It is obvious that there is great need for more industrial schools in this country, such as those in which German workmen are trained. The establishment of such schools can be brought about if a determined effort is made. A comprehensive plan for education along agricultural and industrial lines is included in a bill Senator PAGE, of Vermont, has recently introduced in the United States Senate. This may not be entirely satisfactory to everyone and some of the details can perhaps be amended slightly, but its general purpose is such that it should receive hearty support.

Horticulture, published at Boston, says:

Senate bill 3, by Senator CARROLL S. PAGE, now in the hands of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, provides for Government aid to the States in promoting a better system of education along agricultural and industrial lines and home economics. The problem of wise and efficient training of young men and young women, always a paramount one, becomes now more serious than ever, under the restrictions on a broad-gauge, mechanical knowledge imposed by existing factory methods in the divison of labor and by labor union prescriptions. The high school, the academy, and the college are taking excellent care of those boys who are financially able to avail themselves of their advantages, but for him who can not, little remains but the prospect of a cheap manhood. If the entry of the National Government into a comprehensive and liberal cooperation with the States for instruction in agriculture and the trades will modify and improve these defects in our industrial system, then by all means let us have it, even if it becomes necessary to economize by cutting out a battleship or two. It is an excellent measure, and we hope it will receive a favorable reception everywhere.

Max Mitchell, superintendent of Federated Jewish Charities, Boston, Mass., says:

I am very much interested in this bill and want to add a word of indorsement for the passage of the bill, which tries to cooperate with the States in encouraging instruction in agriculture, trades, and industries.

In the work that I am doing I have for many years felt the great need of work of this kind. I feel that the poor boy does not get a fair chance or an equal chance with the rich boy or the boy of the well-to-do parents to obtain a proper education. In the early years, when the child is 14 and upward, when he is about to get the understanding of an education, he must go to work and earn enough to help support his home. He is thus cut short at the most important time from continuing his studies.

I believe in giving education to the great masses of this great country instead of the small number of 10 per cent, as is given to-day.

To my mind no expenditure is too large that gives the people of the country a proper understanding of themselves, of the conditions surrounding them, and especially a proper understanding and a love for whatever professional trade they are engaged in, because with that kind of education, I am sure, develops a love for one's country and for one's neighbors and for mankind in general.

MICHIGAN.

Hon. Chase S. Osborn, governor of Michigan, writes:

Your bill to cooperate with the various States in encouraging instruction in agriculture, the trades and industries, domestic economics in secondary schools, etc., is a good measure, in my opinion. No nation is better or stronger than the average of its people. The activity you seek to encourage is necessary, and I hope sincerely that your bill will pass.

Jesse B. Davis, principal Central High School, Grand Rapids, says:

My attention has been called to your bill to encourage vocational education among the States in secondary schools. I have read the bill with much interest and wish to express my appreciation of your efforts in this most worthy cause. My experience of over 16 years in the largest secondary schools of the West has made me a strong supporter of this phase of modern education.

The editor of the Michigan Tradesman, Grand Rapids, says:

I am very glad to commend this measure both personally and editorially, because I believe it is in the interest of progressive citizenship and good Americanism.

Mr. James H. Kaye, president Northern State Normal School, Marquette:

I received a copy of your bill and the report of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

I believe in the provisions of the bill most sincerely, and I trust that it will be passed. Should this bill pass, I believe it will mark a great epoch in educational advancement in the United States.

Fannie E. Beal, teacher of home economics, Addison:

The copy of the Page vocational educational bill has reached me, and I wish to say that I heartily indorse the bill. As a teacher of home economics in secondary schools, I believe that every girl needs a training in the affairs of the home and that she should be required to take such a training.

Clara Wheeler, principal Kindergarten Training School, Grand Rapids:

In reply to your letter and documents of February 29 I write to say that I am interested in vocational education. I also favor the general purposes of the bill known as the Page vocational bill.

Mr. W. H. French, department of agricultural education, Michigan Agricultural College, East Lansing:

I have read the amended bill very carefully, and I think your corrections have removed all of the objections stated in my former letter. The bill in its present form seems all right, and if it should become a law it would certainly stimulate the teaching of agriculture to a very large degree.

MINNESOTA.

Hon. MOSES E. CLAPP, United States Senator from Minnesota, says:

Am in receipt of your proposed bill. Permit me to say that while arbitration treaties and trust regulation laws may command more attention, there is no measure pending before Congress that exceeds in importance your bill, because it goes to the very foundation of all our national problems—the development of the citizen. If the Republic will care for the youth of the land to-day, the youth will care for the Republic.

A. F. Woods, dean and director at the University of Minnesota, St. Paul, says:

Executive council of the department of agriculture of the University of Minnesota, consisting of the dean and chiefs of divisions, indorses the Page bill (S. 3), first, because it gives assistance through already organized educational agencies; second, it includes most agencies that need aid in reorganization for industrial education; third, it is a carefully worked out system based on actually existing conditions; fourth, the McKinley and McLaughlin bills are good as far as they go, but relate only to part of the problem.

The editor of the Daily Record, of St. Paul, says:

We are very much interested in this bill and think it should have the support of everybody.

Charles P. Craig, of Duluth, uses this language:

To my mind, no other bill pending before Congress is so important to this country at large in a constructive way as this bill, because its purpose is to lay the foundation broad by the training of all the youth of the Nation for constructive work.

Vocational education will not down. The people are awakening to its value, and with that awakening grow more determined that a national policy of secondary education shall be established, just as has been done with higher industrial education; consequently, your bill admirably fits the growing popular demand. Politics and selfish interests may postpone but will never prevent, ultimately, the passage of this or a similar bill.

Of my own knowledge I know of foreign-born parents in our city of Duluth who have sent their sons back to the old country to learn a trade, with the purpose of coming back here and being skilled tradesmen.

A. D. Wilson, superintendent University Farm, St. Paul, says:

Your letter of December 7 received. This morning we took up at our executive council meeting, consisting of the heads of divisions in our institution, the matter of the Page bill (S. 3). We sent you a telegram expressing our views in favor of the bill. We certainly believe in the Page bill and are ready to give any assistance we can to secure its passage.

C. G. Schulz, superintendent department of public instruction, St. Paul, says:

I heartily approve the provisions of this measure. It is along the same lines as those in which Minnesota has undertaken to foster that work in connection with high schools, secondary agricultural schools, and the college of agriculture.

I am fully satisfied that the plan outlined in your bill for industrial training, not only in secondary schools, but in colleges and normal schools, is practical, comprehensive, fair, and demanded by present-day conditions. The school must be a training institution which directs the child's activity, not only along one line, but many. There must also be the means, in professional schools, of fitting leaders, directors, and teachers. This your bill makes possible.

The Minnesota State Dairyman's Association, at its annual convention held at Wadena, January 16–19, 1912, passed the following resolution:

In view of the need of a more practical type of education in our schools and the demonstration of improved methods of production on our farms, be it

Resolved, That this association approve the Page bill introduced in the National Congress with these ends in view. We hereby request our Senators and Representatives to do all in their power to secure the passage of this measure, the secretary of this association to forward copies of this resolution to our Senators and Representatives, the chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on Agriculture, and to Senator PAGE.

Lilla P. Frich, supervisor of domestic science, board of education, Minneapolis:

Your letter of March 1 and the copy of Senate bill No. 3 is received. This measure has my hearty approval, and I trust there will be no difficulty in the passage of this bill.

Mr. L. L. Everly, principal Teachers' Training School, St. Paul:

Your letter of February 29 inclosing a copy of Senate bill 3 is at hand. I am heartily in favor of this bill with its substantial provisions for vocational and industrial education. I believe no more important bill will come before this Congress. This institution thoroughly indorses the plan outlined in this bill.

Mr. Andrew Boss, department of agriculture, University of Minnesota, St. Paul:

Our institution has stood squarely for your bill. We are all in accord on the merits of the bill, and I believe that it should be passed. It is so much more comprehensive than the Lever bill, and still so elastic that any State need not be burdened with financial difficulties, that we consider it decidedly the best measure.

MISSISSIPPI.

J. C. Hardy, president Mississippi Agricultural and Mechanical College, says:

I am heartily in favor of this bill for industrial and vocational education. While I appreciate the importance of training "captains of industry," yet in my judgment there is a still greater need of giving the "privates of industry" that training that will fit them for coping with modern industrial conditions and that will make them more efficient in dealing with all the complex problems of modern life. I think the man or woman who is serving the world by manual labor is entitled to as much consideration by the State and Nation as those who are engaged in the professions and other intellectual pursuits.

This bill, as I view it, is an effort to adapt education to the needs of the democracy. The State needs men and women who can do things more than it needs men and women of culture.

This institution thoroughly indorses your bill, and each and every man here stands ready to help in every possible way to develop public sentiment that will demand its passage.

Our people in hearty sympathy with the principle of bill. It means more to the development of our section than any bill since Hatch Act. It has full indorsement of this college. All conditions should be fixed in bill; leave nothing to be fought out in the legislature; command us to fullest.

W. L. Hutchinson, dean of the School of Agriculture, Starkville, says:

Regret I could not be present at the conference of the friends of the Page bill. The objects sought to be accomplished by the bill are laudable and much to be desired.

MISSOURI.

William P. Evans, State superintendent of public schools, Jefferson City, says:

In general, Senate bill 3, encouraging and aiding industrial education, has my hearty approval. The purposes of the measure are very laudable, and I shall be willing to lend my influence toward securing its passage.

We are hoping to push in this State rapidly the establishment of rural high schools and are proposing to secure a permanent fund for this purpose from the voters of Missouri at the next general election. It is this proposition that I refer to in my letter to Gov. Hadley. The proposition for the permanent education fund will be voted upon at the next general election, under the initiative and referendum. This, you see, is along precisely the same lines as your movement in Senate bill 3, to enlarge the unit of taxation.

In general, this measure of Senator PAGE'S and the measure that we are advocating for Missouri is a movement to enlarge the taxation unit. They are twin movements, one may say. The permanent education fund is a movement to derive funds from the State at large in order to equalize opportunities for the weak districts. The same thing may be said of this national movement. It is a proposition to make the unit Nation wide, and in this broad way equalize opportunities for all of the youth of the land.

It seems to me that the bill should be amended somewhat and should pass. I shall be very glad if you see fit to encourage its adoption, even in its present form, for provision is made, you will note, that each State shall receive that portion of the appropriation for which it is prepared, and if the appropriation is made for these district high schools and the district high schools are not established, we will receive the other aid which we are ready for.

I heartily favor the bill except the clause relating to district agricultural high schools. I advise that the appropriations for such schools be added to that for public secondary schools and normal schools for brief reasons in a letter which follows.

W. G. Carrington, State Normal School, fourth district, Springfield, says:

I assure you I am doing all I can in my territory to secure support for this measure. I am writing some letters to our Senators about it.

Anthony Ittner, of St Louis, late chairman of the committee on industrial education, National Association of Manufacturers, says:

The point with me is to have the Page bill so framed as to benefit the 98 per cent of the young men of our country—those that need help. The 2 per cent that pass through colleges and universities are the sons of wealthy parents who, being able to help themselves, do not need help from State government.

Dr. Lowell M. McAfee, president Park College, Parkville:

Replying to yours of the 22d of February, will say I find myself cordially in sympathy with the purposes of Senate bill No. 3, if I understand it in detail. I agree with you most cordially that the surest way to save our young fellows is to fit them for the experiences which are sure to be theirs. Park College was organized and has operated on that basis for a good many years.

MONTANA.

J. M. Hamilton, president Montana Agricultural College, says:

We heartily indorse the principles of Federal aid for secondary industrial education as set forth in the Page bill, and would especially emphasize the features providing for agricultural high schools and agricultural extension.

F. B. Linfield, director of the Montana Agricultural Experiment Station, Bozeman, says:

As director of the agricultural experiment station and a member of our board of farmers' institutes, am keenly interested in educational efficiency on agricultural and industrial lines. I am heartily interested in the Federal appropriation as outlined in the Page bill. I trust the friends of agricultural education, who all agree on the principles at the foundation of these bills, will work out a plan of development that will be satisfactory and beneficial to all interested.

The editor of the Rocky Mountain Husbandman, Great Falls, says:

We heartily indorse your bill. Hope it may pass.

Mr. C. A. Duniway, president University of Montana, Missoula:

I am much interested in your inquiry concerning Senate bill No. 3, known as the Page bill. The passage of some measure of this character would greatly advance the public welfare. I have no suggestions to make concerning the details of your bill. Its passage in its present form would seem to me to be desirable.

NEBRASKA.

Mr. James E. Delzell, State superintendent of public instruction of Nebraska, Lincoln:

I am very much pleased with the Page vocational-education bill. I will be glad to assist in every way possible to advance this bill.

Mr. J. W. Crabtree, formerly State superintendent department of public instruction, Lincoln, says:

Permit me to thank you for sending me a copy of the bill which you introduced offering encouragement to the teaching of agriculture in the public schools, normal schools, and colleges of the country. I sincerely hope you may be able to secure the passage of this bill. If its provisions are carried out, this information and instruction in agriculture and home economics will be brought right down to the homes of the people. It seems to me that this is the important step to be taken at this time. I shall watch with interest the progress of this bill and use my influence wherever possible in its behalf.

Editor Hatch, of the Nebraska Farm Journal, writes:

There is no man of average information and intelligence but who knows that this country is letting the brains of the Nation go to waste because no adequate vocational training is provided for the large middle class of America. Your bill seems to provide the only practical way to quicken, increase, and develop the average American deficiency. We hope your measure will pass.

E. C. Bishop, former State superintendent of public instruction, State of Nebraska, says:

A copy of the bill (S. 3) which you kindly inclosed meets my approval, and I am glad to do what I can to encourage its passage.

NEVADA.

John Edwards Bray, superintendent of public instruction, Carson, says:

I heartily approve Page bill for encouraging instruction in agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in secondary schools. If the secondary schools are to get into touch with the industrial progress of the age, all these things must be made features of practical instruction. National aid is needed, and it will be worth more than a thousand battleships.

The several district educational institutes of Nevada have recently held meetings at Elko, Tonopah, and Las Vegas. At every one of those institutes this bill was one of the important subjects of discussion, and at each meeting the bill was very strongly indorsed.

At the Elko institute the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That we approve the Page bill now pending in the United States Senate providing for national aid in the various States for agricultural and industrial training in the high schools as a measure of enlightened statesmanship. The bill proposes to place yearly at the disposal of the States several millions of dollars, the first use of the money to be for the preparation of teachers for this work.

At Tonopah institute the following resolution was adopted:

Whereas there is pending in the United States Senate a measure known as the Page bill, which has for its object the appropriation of national funds to aid and encourage agricultural and industrial training in the secondary (high) schools of all the States; and

Whereas such expenditure would be of vastly more benefit to our country than the millions now annually spent in building battleships for the destruction of human life or for useless display: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we strongly favor the Page bill and earnestly request Senators NEWLANDS and NIXON and Representative ROBERTS to give it their support.

At the Las Vegas institute the following resolutions was adopted:

Be it resolved, That we favor the introduction of the elements of agriculture and industrial training in the school curriculum. We commend the Page bill now pending in the United States Senate. It proposes to appropriate national funds for agricultural and industrial education in the various States, first for the training of teachers, and then for the maintenance of such instruction in all secondary schools.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

J. C. Kendall, director New Hampshire Agricultural Experiment Station, New Hampshire College, Durham, says:

I am in hearty sympathy with the work which the Southern Commerical Congress has undertaken in pushing the Page bill, and I would like very much to be present at the conference which is to be held in Washington, December 14, 15, and 16, but I am afraid that it will not be possible for me to be away at that time.

A large problem before the people of the United States to-day is putting within the reach of all the opportunity for education along the lines of their everyday life. We must change our school system in such a way that they will recognize the fact that when properly treated and when suitable instructors are provided there will be just as good training in the study of farm problems as in reading Greek.

I wish for you and your associates and the organization that you represent success in the passage of this bill, which will mean so much to the future industrial development and prosperity of the country.

Mr. Ernest L. Silver, principal of the State Normal School, Plymouth:

It seems to me that this bill is particularly sane and sound and that its enactment into law would be an immense benefit to our country. I believe that any abridgment or substitution would be inimical to the cause of popular education and the progress of American civic and industrial life. I assure you that this is not my opinion alone, but the opinion of all the educational men of New Hampshire.

NEW JERSEY.

Franklin Dye, secretary of the State board of agriculture, Trenton, writes:

Believing your work to be in the right direction, I can but wish you good success.

E. R. Johnstone, superintendent of the training school at Vineland, writes:

I have received your letter of December 1 and a copy of Senate bill 3, introduced April 6. May I express my hearty approval of its provisions?

Mr. K. C. Davis, principal College of Agriculture, Rutgers College and Scientific School, New Brunswick:

I think your bill is the best one now before Congress loking toward the extension of agricultural education, and I hope it will pass.

Emily S. Hamblen, secretary of the Public Welfare Committee of Essex County, N. J.:

No educational measure could meet with heartier approval from me than does this bill, and I am confident that I am speaking unofficially for our society, for I know that both collectively and individually we stand for such solutions of our social and economic problems.

I believe that such constructive work, beginning at the foundation in educational methods, as will fit the individual both to adapt himself to varying conditions and to develop the natural resources of our country is worth all the political reconstruction ever proposed or dreamed of.

Dr. Byron D. Halstead, director New Jersey Agricultural College Experiment Station, New Brunswick:

Your kind favor of the 20th instant is received. I have read your bill No. 3 and the report upon the same; and it gives me much pleasure to reply, as you suggest, and as follows: The intents of the bill are most excellent, and I trust that it will be enacted. This is a natural sequence of the land grant act of 1862 and the Hatch and Adams Acts of more recent date, for they have provided a proper foundation for a popular vocational education that is designed to reach all the industrial classes. The passage of this bill will help to bring the United States to an educational plane that will command the admiration of all those nations now far ahead of us in the prime essentials of progressive citizenship.

Mr. W. S. Willis, principal Normal and Training School, Newark:

Vocational training will occupy a large place in our educational system, and, if the best results are to be obtained, special preparation for this should be given for this work. I trust the appropriations, as suggested in your bill, will prevail.

NEW MEXICO.

Hon. W. C. McDonald, governor of New Mexico, Santa Fe:

I am just in receipt of your letter of the 14th instant inclosing copy of the report on your vocational-education bill. I can say without hesitation that I am in thorough sympathy with such a measure, and will give it my unqualified support. Our first State legislature will convene on March 11. There will then be chosen two Senators to represent New Mexico at the National Congress, and I am quite sure they will help along with your industrial-education bill.

Mr. Frank H. H. Roberts, president New Mexico State Normal University, Las Vegas:

At a recent meeting of the board of education of the State of New Mexico Senate bill No. 3, known as the Page bill, was indorsed, and your honorable body is petitioned to pass the same.

Mr. E. A. Drake, president New Mexico State School of Mines, Socorro:

In reply to your esteemed favor of February 22, I beg leave to say that I am heartily in favor of the Page bill, or any other bill for the encouragement of vocational education.

Mr. C. M. Light, principal Normal School of New Mexico, Silver City:

I am in receipt of Senate bill No. 3 in reference to vocational education. I heartily approve of the plan of the bill, especially that feature of it referring to instruction in vocational training through the normal schools. This matter appeals very forcibly to the Spanish-American people throughout the State. If there is any people who need vocational training it is the Spanish-American. He seems fit for nothing but positions of drudgery; his knowledge of agriculture and the trades is very crude. The system of training according to the plan in this bill is the very thing which, it seems to me, he needs. Any aid which we can give you in the passage of the measure will be cheerfully given.

William H. Andrews, Territorial Delegate from New Mexico, says:

I thoroughly believe in this bill, which I have read carefully.

B. S. Gowen, New Mexico Normal University, says:

I am interested in the bill whose purpose it is to encourage instruction in agriculture, the trades, and home economics. Such work as this is of unusual importance in New Mexico, where we have so large a population that it must necessarily depend on other lines besides those in which scholarship of the ordinary kind plays the chief part.

Prof. Luther Foster, dean and director division of agriculture, New Mexico College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, Agricultural College, New Mexico:

I am pleased to acknowledge yours, inclosing a copy of the Page bill and also report of subcommittee on the same. All things considered, I believe it the most satisfactory bill for all interests concerned that has been presented, and I would be very glad to see it become a law.

NEW YORK.

Dr. J. G. Schurman, president of Cornell University, says:

I am greatly interested in the subject, as I feel very deeply the need of making better provisions than we now have for encouraging instruction in agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in institutions of instruction readily accessible to the mass of our people.

Chancellor James R. Day, of Syracuse University, says:

It is not enough to educate a few specialists for management of large estates or the farms of fancy farmers. Farm education should be as extensive as farming. It should be within reach of all parts of the State as plain, practical courses of study, illustrated by object lessons of farms and grounds and by animals, plants, fruits, insects, friendly and destructive birds, beneficial and harmful, and in practical farm industries and in higher courses in chemistry, bacteriology, soil analysis, and animal and plant breeding, farm economics, farm architecture, and engineering. In short, the farmers should be prepared for their high calling, as are the doctors, lawyers, and teachers. The time must come, is inevitable, when the farmer ignorant of his calling and conditions will be as unusual and impossible as an ignorant doctor or lawyer at his practice.

Eli W. Weaver, chairman of students' aid committee of the High School Teachers' Association, New York City, says:

There are in New York City to-day thousands of young people who have been trained to high ideals in the homes of self-sacrificing parents, who have deserved and received considerate treatment in the schools, and who have enjoyed the respect and esteem of their associates, who have afterwards gone out to earn their own living in those occupations usually open to young people; but too frequently these young people have been compelled to wander around for days in an aimless search for employment; they have been persuaded to accept places at pitiful wages, with promises of advancement, in which they have afterwards learned that there were never any prospects of advancement; they have outgrown places in which there was no special skill or knowledge to be acquired, from which they were turned out without faith either in themselves or their fellow men or a belief in the existence of a sense of fairness or justice in society. However well equipped the barks in which the youthful sailors launch out on the troublesome seas of commercial and industrial life may be, the chances are against them unless they are provided with sailing directions. Since society must in some way or other care for the disheartened, the broken-spirited, and the ruined, it might be well for society to provide the sailing directions.

Mr. Dean, chief of the division of trade schools, New York, says:

The school if yesterday trained its youth for a job, while the school of to-morrow will train its youth for a vocation. It provides for every vocation for which there is reasonable demand, and in that school the boy must remain until there is ground for believing that he has found a calling for which nature and his own effort has prepared him.

My father sent me to a school of yesterday so much that I very nearly missed an education.

The school of to-morrow will have over its door, "We conserve the whole boy."

Francis J. Cheney, principal State Normal and Training School, Cortland, says:

I regret exceedingly that I shall not be able to be present at the conference of the friends of the Page bill (Senate bill 3) on December 14, 15, and 16 on account of duties in connection with my work as principal of the State normal school. I am very greatly interested in this bill and believe that its passage will be for the best interests of the young people whom we are training for citizenship. Certainly the idea embodied in the bill is taking a great hold on the country. The Page bill is an effort in the right direction to the better fitting of our young people for useful and successful lives.

Benjamin R. Andrews, secretary-treasurer of the Teachers' College, New York City, says:

I am glad to know that your bill for Federal aid to education is securing increasing support. I judge from the talk of economy that it may be impossible to secure enactment at this session, but I hope that you can get favorable action in the Senate. It will be a great step forward.

The Knickerbocker Press, Albany, says:

The Page bill seems admirably suited to promote the ends desired, and its advocates should receive the fullest cooperation from the representatives of the Empire State.

The National Provisioner, New York, says:

The bill of Senator PAGE deserves really active, not merely perfunctory, support.

Educators of national reputation are giving their support to the bill, and it should pass; but, like all measures proposed in Congress, merit alone will not be sufficient to secure its enactment. Public sentiment must be aroused and its virtues made known.

This seems to be a sensible, systematic way of increasing knowledge of how to expand our supply of live stock and other agricultural products, as well as to educate the future generations in other useful directions.

C. W. Burkett, editor of the American Agriculturist, New York, says:

I am very much interested in your bill, which proposes that the National Government shall cooperate with the States in encouraging instruction in agriculture, the trades, industries, and home economics in secondary schools and in preparing teachers for these vocational subjects. I do not hesitate to say that this measure, if enacted into law, will be of the utmost benefit, not only to agriculture, but to the entire country.

I have made a very careful examination of the bill and have studied the needs of the schools for a great many years, and I am confident that this measure is one of the most needful now before Congress, and that I am expressing the opinion of tens and hundreds of thousands of farmers and industrial people when I urge the passage of this measure.

The American Agriculturist weeklies are with you heart and soul in this matter. In the past we have given page after page to the effort to secure a better system of education along agricultural and industrial lines. Just recently I have had an editorial telling about the Page bill and what it seeks to do. We shall keep right at this matter, hoping that in the end the idea will win.

The Business Men's Association of Newburgh gives expression to a most important thought in this language:

The lack of knowledge of how to till the soil is the great economic evil of our country, and it can easily be corrected by teaching the rising generation the art of agriculture. No nation can be truly great that is not firmly established on a sound agricultural basis.

Everyone takes a great interest and pleasure in his work, no matter what it is, if he can do it well, and his joy is in his work in proportion to his skill.

The dissatisfied workers resort to strikes and employers to lockouts, creating enmity where there should be friendship and cooperation.

* * * * * * *

Are we leading the world, as we should do, in solving this problem? Are we even abreast of other nations in this respect? No; by no means. We are perhaps third or fourth to Germany, Switzerland, Denmark, and probably Sweden. What are they doing that is better than our methods? They are, first, developing children physically and training their hands as much as their brains and giving each a trade. Rich and poor alike must learn a trade, even to the sons of the Emperor of Germany. They have, then, an appreciation of the dignity of labor, instead of despising it, as we do.

We have great conventions of governors in Washington to beg for a conservation of the resources of our country, when our Nation's greatest resources, the lives and health of our children, are being squandered in nearly every school in the country.

The Engineering News, New York City, says:

I heartily agree with you that the greatest need of the country to-day is to better the instruction in our common schools and secondary schools, so as to better fit the students therein for the real work of life.

The Commercial, Buffalo, says:

There is little doubt that eventually some system similar to that proposed by Senator PAGE will become effective. More and more the attention of the country is being turned to the necessity of better facilities for industrial and agricultural education for the young of the rural sections, and the present bill, while it may have its defects, is sure to have its influence in securing legislation along the lines suggested.

It is a remarkable coincidence that another Vermont man, Senator Morrill, was the father of the bill which established the State college of agriculture and mechanic arts.

The editor of the Financial World, of New York, says:

We quite approve of any efforts made that will lead to an increased efficiency of our men of to-morrow.

Mr. L. P. Alford, editor of the American Machinist, New York City, says:

Your letter of July 17, with its inclosure, a copy of Senate bill 3, is before me. I have read both with a great deal of interest. For some four years I have been studying the problem of industrial education, and a great deal of space has been devoted to it in our journal.

As a simple act of justice it seems to me that our Federal Government should appropriate funds for the furthering of the education of industrial workers in the same way that it fosters the spread of agricultural knowledge.

I most heartily agree with the sentiment expressed in your letter to the effect that we must do something for the boys and girls of the great middle classes in order to really fit them for earning a livelihood. We are far behind Germany and Switzerland in this particular. Something must be done at once to aid in transforming the green boy of the country and the untrained lad of the city into men trained and educated in some trade or vocation from which they can earn a comfortable living, and by the exercise of which they will be valuable units in our industrial life. I shall watch the course of this bill with a great deal of interest. The purpose of this bill is worthy, and I shall support it as far as it is proper for me to do in the columns of my journal.

Mr. Fred W. Atkinson, president the Polytechnic Institute, Brooklyn:

I am in heartiest sympathy with your bill, and a rather careful reading of it suggests no important changes. You certainly are on the right track.

Mr. Charles H. Levermore, president Adelphi College, Brooklyn:

Of course you are on the right track. I sincerely hope that Senate bill No. 3 will become a law.

Prof. Mary Schenck Woolman, Teachers' College, Columbia University, New York City:

The purposed bill is as important to the woman of the United States and to the homes as to the industries. Women are going untrained into the industries and are in grave danger to their health and to their morals. The passage of this bill will provide a preparation which will give girls a training which will be of equal value in the homes as well as for wage earning and provide the qualities for the best class of citizen. In providing for teachers' training you recognize a very valuable part of the work. The old teacher of manual training is helpless in this new field, as also the academic teacher. They do not know industry nor its sociological, economic, and technical needs. They fail in teaching and inspiring the students on account of their lack of opportunity and special training.

Mr. F. L. Holtz, Brooklyn Training School for Teachers, Brooklyn:

I have read the bill for encouraging instruction in industrial education, and am in favor of such legislation.

Miss Mary E. Williams, department of education of New York City:

Please accept my thanks for the copy of the Senate bill No. 3 and your report thereon. It is intensely interesting to me and my staff of 170 teachers, and you have our most earnest wish and every good word that we may be able to say of the passage of so important a bill to the Nation.

In New York City we are teaching home economics for the last 10 years in the secondary schools, as you will see by the course of study inclosed. For some years we have been able to extend the work to girls over age in the grades below 7 A, but we were obliged to drop all these special classes this year because of shortage of funds. On this account hundreds of girls will go to the different trades and vocations without any instruction in the highest of all vocations—that of home making.

Mr. L. Ray Balderston, Teachers' College, Columbia University, New York City:

I am in hearty sympathy with the work as being pushed by the Page bill. It is to be hoped that it passes and brings all the good bound to follow.

Prof. Arthur W. Gilbert, College of Agriculture, Cornell University, Ithaca:

I am very pleased to indorse your bill on vocational education—Senate bill No. 3. I am strongly convinced that the passage of this bill will enormously benefit the people of the United States.

Such a measure will greatly stimulate instruction in agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in agricultural schools.

Mr. E. J. Goodwin, principal The Packer Collegiate Institute, Brooklyn:

I write to indorse heartily Senate bill No. 3, designed to encourage vocational education along the lines of the trades and industries, agriculture, and home economics. I am sure that this bill, if enacted into law, would open a much needed new era for the industrial training of our boys and girls.

Mr. F. J. Trinder, superintendent of apprentices, General Electric Co., Schenectady:

Senate bill 3, to provide for the industrial training of boys and girls, as introduced by you deserves to meet with the hearty support of your colleagues, also of the parents, the citizens, and the voters of the country.

We are very much interested in any of the vocational school work, no matter by what name it is known, either as trade school or part-time school, so long as it is planned and conducted in a way that shows that real intensified work is accomplished.

If our State educational bureau would wake up and do something in this line really worth while, our boys would be raised in a few years above the standard of pool-room attendants, street loafers, and would not be applicants for the county house at the age of 50, when too old to perform the duties of a laborer or street sweeper.

Mr. William Church Osborne, president Children's Aid Society, New York City:

With reference to your bill (S. 3) for Federal aid to agricultural and industrial education, I heartily approve of your proposition if carried out in the amended form.

Miss Helen Kinne, professor of household arts education, Columbia University, New York City:

I hope that my delay does not make my letter useless. I certainly approve the bill and will do whatever is in my power to forward it. I am telling the students in this department about the purport of the bill, and as they go to their homes they will, of course, spread the knowledge of it. While that may not have a direct and immediate result, it certainly should help in the future.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Hon. William W. Kitchin, governor of North Carolina, says:

In reply to your letter of the 11th, I favor the extension of agricultural, mechanical, and industrial education, and favor the general purposes of the bill which you inclosed.

D. H. Hill, president College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, Raleigh, says:

I have gone over the bill which you were kind enough to send me with a great deal of care. The general features of the bill commend themselves very strongly to my judgment. The Nation certainly needs training along the lines suggested in the measures embodied in this bill and I hope that the general plan may be carried out.

C. N. Evans, of the board of governors of the Southern Commercial Congress, Wilmington, says:

Regret I can not appear before you in warm support of the Page bill. In the interest of a broader national view and of our children especially, I urge the adoption of the Page bill and trust its provisions may meet the approval of your committee.

J. Y. Joyner, superintendent of public instruction of North Carolina, says:

I heartily favor the passage of the bill.

About 82 per cent of the people in the Southern States are engaged in agricultural pursuits. No adequate provision has been made by any State for the proper education and training of children for the pursuits that the large majority of our people are now following for a living.

The bill proposes to stimulate and help the States to help themselves without being paternalistic, without interfering with the autonomy of the State systems of education, or without any undue interference in any way by Federal authority with State authority.

The editor of the Progressive Farmer Gazette, Raleigh, says:

We shall be only too glad to do all in our power to help carry out your ideas. The measure meets with our hearty approval.

Mr. William C. A. Hammel, State Normal and Industrial College, Greensboro:

I certainly wish to indorse your bill on vocational training and will lend all aid to help you in any way possible.

Having taught manual arts for 20 years and working with the teachers of the whole South in my summer school work, I feel that the bill introduced by you will help along the 94 per cent of the boys and girls who never reach the high school.

If I can be of any service to you in your cause, please do not hesitate to write me. I stand ready to help.

Mr. W. A. Withers, North Carolina College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, West Raleigh:

I have read over the bill carefully and am satisfied that its passage will result in a great advancement of the agricultural interests of the Union. As the progress of our whole country depends to a large extent upon our rural population, you will be serving the entire people in securing the passage of this bill. If I am able to assist you in any way, it will give me great pleasure to do so.

NORTH DAKOTA.

Mr. George A. McFarland, president State Normal School, Valley City:

I know of nothing that would be so influential in bringing our educational practice up to the practical demands of the times as the passage of the Page Senate bill. Our high schools, normal schools, and colleges need the stimulation this bill will give them. * * *

As an agricultural State, I am satisfied that the entire State is much interested in the passage of this bill. Vocational education has a great hold upon the minds of our people. They would be unwilling to accept the argument that there is no money for such an appropriation when the Government is considering the building of battleships that will cost nearly twice as much as the annual appropriation for vocational education.

You may count on me for any assistance that I can possibly render in your efforts to get this bill through Congress.

Mr. E. L. Ladd, dean department of chemistry, North Dakota Agricultural College, Agricultural College:

Senate bill No. 3, to promote vocational education, is a measure that should receive the support of every right-thinking man who is anxious for the promotion of education for all the people. With the support as proposed in this bill for the furthering of industrial education, great good will come to the industrial classes of the United States; and the development of agriculture and the industries will be assured along lines that will make for the best interests of the country at large.

I am, therefore, heartily in sympathy with the measure and trust that it may become a law.

J. W. Preston, president Normal School at Madison, says:

Our State teachers' association last week indorsed Senate bill 3 and urged our congressional delegation to support same. Educational sentiment in this State strongly favors the bill.

Hon. L. B. HANNA, M. C., says:

I am in receipt of your letter of 9th instant. It goes without saying, Senator, that I will do everything I possibly can to help you to push this matter along. I believe the bill is right.

Mr. H. L. Bolley, dean department of biology, North Dakota Agricultural College, Agricultural College:

I have your letter of February 20, inclosing Senate bill No. 3, a bill to cooperate with the States in encouraging instruction in agriculture, etc. I am not an expert on the technicalities of law, but reading the purpose and intent of the bill, I am convinced that it should prove a great boon to this country. Just in proportion as our people are enlightened as to agriculture and enlightened in the trades and industries of life will this country prosper. I believe that the bill is well worded to give a proper stimulus along lines in which much aid is needed.

OHIO.

Mr. H. C. Minnick, dean Ohio State Normal College, Oxford:

Your letter of recent date received, also a copy of your vocational bill and report of the Subcommittee on Agriculture and Forestry. If Congress shall make such provision for the promotion of industrial and vocational education as is described in your bill, it will make the greatest contribution toward realizing the modern aim of education for the masses that has ever been made in this country. The high schools as they are now established provide training almost exclusively for those who are going into the professions. The schools are organized on that basis, and it is almost impossible to reconstruct them. The provisions of your bill will make it possible for the reorganization of secondary education in this country so that the 96 per cent of the workers will receive an education preparing them for their work as well as the 4 per cent or the professional class. The bill is comprehensive in the fact that it makes provision for the encouragement of the industries, provides schools in which the industries may be taught, and provides for the preparation of teachers to instruct in these industrial studies. I consider it a great contribution to the forward movement in education.

Mr. A. B. Church, president Buchtel College, Akron:

In my judgment, you are working along the right lines for the elevation and betterment of the coming generations. The broad, distinctive characteristic of our American civilization is its broad, democratic system of public education. It is the hope of this Republic more than of any Republic that has existed or can exist as a transformation of a monarchical form of government. I sincerely hope that you will succeed in your undertaking. I congratulate you upon the step you have taken, and offer you my cooperation.

Mr. James W. McLane, principal Normal Training School, Cleveland:

Although ours is a city normal school, and not included in the provisions of Senate bill 3, the Page bill, I wish to enroll my name on the list of those who favor the cause of vocational, and especially of agricultural, education.

The only possible explanation of our slowness in reaching the formulation of such a bill as yours is that we have not really understood the full import of the word "education." What we call "education" has been too far away from what we call "life"; and legislative enactments like the one you propose will go far to bridge the chasm that still yawns between the two.

So courage to your soul and wisdom to your counsels. We shall eventually value properly the practical in education, without the least danger of sacrificing the cultivative in the inspirational.

Mr. Lee R. Knight, principal Perkins Normal Training School, Akron:

Your favor of February 29 and the report on vocational education were duly received and read.

I am thoroughly in sympathy with the purposes of the bill, and I am unable to see how any intelligent citizen can hold any other attitude. Education of the people presents the fundamental problems of the Nation. And this is no mere cant. Education has tended to become limited to the world of books, to become cultural in the wrong sense of not being useful save for ornament to the superior mind supposed to possess it.

Poverty oppresses the land, but it is a poverty of potent ideas, not a material poverty. There are, perhaps, enough ideas, but too many of them are pale and attenuated from being dissociated from the activities of life. In other words, poverty means paucity and impotency of ideas; fewness and feebleness, not as applied to dollars, but as applied to ideas. Vocational education should strongly tend and ultimately result, if wisely conducted, in a mighty amelioration of conditions.

Mr. A. D. Selby, Ohio Agricultural Experiment Station, Wooster:

I had been much interested in the discussions on the Page bill before the Association of Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations in Columbus in November last. I have recently run through amended bill, and wish to express my heartiest approval of the measure.

Hon. J. J. WHITACRE, M. C., Ohio, says:

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your kind invitation asking me to take part in the conference called December 14–16 for the discussion of the Page vocational educational bill. I regret to say that I can not attend because of meetings of the House Agricultural Committee, but I hasten to assure you that I am in complete sympathy with the object of the bill, and anything I can do to further the movement, as a member of the House Agricultural Committee, will be done most willingly and cheerfully.

Henry G. Williams, dean of the State Normal College of Ohio and member of the national committee on agricultural education, says:

Your notice of the 7th concerning the meeting of the Senate committee, December 14, 15, 16, at hand. I would like very much to be present and assist in presenting the matter to the committee. It may be possible for me to do so. If I am not present, you may expect a night letter. I am very much interested in it, and have done as much perhaps as anyone else to further the campaign on behalf of Senate bill 3.

The editor of the Farm and Fireside, of Springfield, writes:

I believe that the future of agriculture in this country depends upon a basic reform in rural schools in the direction of the correlation of the rural schools with rural life. I am therefore intensely interested in your letter and in the bill which accompanies it, and promise you the active cooperation of Farm and Fireside in so far as our space will permit. Personally I think the bill would accomplish an educational revolution of the most beneficent sort.

B. M. Davis, president of the agricultural and rural education department of the National Education Association, Oxford, says:

I am greatly interested in the provisions of the bill, and have been ever since the matter was first started.

Mr. Eugene F. Cranz, secretary Ohio State Grange, Ira:

I have again been reading over your vocational educational bill, S. 3, and I am strongly impressed with the far-reaching provisions it contains.

OKLAHOMA.

Mr. U. J. Griffith, president Southwestern State Normal College, Weatherford:

I am a believer in the Page bill and am doing what I can in its support.

The time is at hand when education must stand upon some other foundation than cultural sentimentality. At least State education must do so. Against the Page bill are arrayed all the forces of fogyism and pedantry; and it will encounter the bitter antagonism of all who believe in special privilege—the educational hardshells who are opposed to education "as a means of grace," but would reserve it for the "edification of the saints."

Dr. Edmund D. Murdaugh, president Southeastern State Normal School, Durant:

Let me at once thank you for your letter and the accompanying report, which I have read to-day with pleasure and profit.

Please command my efforts to aid in so worthy a cause.

Mr. B. C. Pittuck, dean college-extension division, Oklahoma Agricultural and Mechanical College, Stillwater:

I have your letter of February 16 and wish to thank you for the copy of the revised and perfected Page bill. President Connell and I have been doing all in our power since our visit to Washington to create a proper interest in your bill, and I believe that some good has been accomplished. This institution will work for the Page bill as strenuously as possible.

Prof. Minna C. Stoner, Oklahoma Agricultural and Mechanical College, Stillwater:

Your letter with literature concerning Senate bill 3 received. I heartily indorse everything the bill involves because of the great impetus it will give to our American system of education and industrial economic problems.

Gov. Lee Cruce, of Oklahoma, says:

I wish to thank you for copy of Senate bill 3, introduced by you.

I shall be glad to cooperate in any way possible with the State superintendent to bring about proper action along this line.

R. H. Wilson, superintendent department of education, State of Oklahoma, Oklahoma City, says:

I want to say that I can not speak too highly of the Page bill. It will certainly be of great assistance to this section of the country.

J. H. Connell, president Agricultural and Mechanical College, Stillwater, says:

Oklahoma is earnestly in favor of this bill because with Federal aid we can quickly reach 5,000 common schools and develop a new agricultural civilization.

We are not waiting for the Federal Government, but would quickly and largely benefit by the wisely expended assistance provided by this measure.

I favor the immediate passage of the Page bill, with some minor amendments.

Grant B. Grumline, president Northwestern State Normal School, Alva, says:

In the November issue of our monthly bulletin, which goes to about 1,800 school-teachers in this part of the State, we are urging that each of them use their influence for the Page bill, Senate bill 3.

James A. Wilson, director Oklahoma Agricultural Experiment Station, Stillwater, says:

I am sending to-night by Western Union wire a night letter expressing as strongly as my vocabulary is able to the position which we take in Oklahoma toward the Page bill. Oklahoma stands squarely for the Page bill. Anticipating this nation-wide industrial system of education our State constitution directed our legislature to provide for such instruction in the common schools. Our normal and agricultural high schools are doing the grade of work indicated in the Page bill. It provides for our greatest need. I wish you the greatest possible success in this worthy movement.

OREGON.

Hon. Oswald West, governor of Oregon, says:

Your letter of December 11 and inclosed copy of your Senate bill 3, together with data in regard thereto, reached my office during my absence in the East. From the hurried view that I have been able to give your bill its general provisions meet with my approval. I can say as a general proposition that any measure which has to do with the betterment and upbuilding of the agricultural-school system meets with my approval if drafted along sane and consistent lines.

I wish you success in this direction.

The Pacific Banker, Portland, says:

Some time ago it was our pleasure to make brief favorable comment upon a bill which Senator PAGE, of Vermont, has introduced in the Senate, and which we again wish to give editorial indorsement because of its peculiar significance to the entire country, and to further encourage, if need be, the action of the committees appointed from Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and other Western States in its behalf.

The question which he agitates and which he would thus aid and abet is not new. There is no denial of the fact that the greatest phase of the problem of maintaining the future prosperity of this country lies in the need of our better knowledge, and the better knowledge of the generations to come, of the science of agriculture. It is eminently fit that the banker should lend his influence to the indorsement of Mr. PAGE'S recommendation, which has already had the recognition of the Senate, for, if we are ever going to bring about permanent systems of agriculture in this country, the banker, above every other business man, has got to lend unto the endeavor his unfailing energy.

W. J. Kerr, president Oregon State Agricultural College, Corvallis, says:

Your favor of the 4th instant, with inclosures, has just reached me. I heartily approve the general purpose of the bill as set forth in the resolution adopted by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The editor of the Rural Spirit, Portland, says:

I most heartily approve of your educational bill and assure you of my appreciation of your efforts along this line and of my willingness to cooperate at any and all times.

This bill is especially intended to aid agriculture and is a very meritorious bill and should have the support of farmers through their Representatives in Congress.

The editor of the Northwest Poultry Journal, Salem, says:

I congratulate you on the bill. It ought to pass.

Dr. Marion R. Drury, president Philomath College, Philomath:

I have yours of February 22. Replying, I would say I am in most hearty accord with your proposition for a Federal appropriation to encourage vocational education. I have read your bill, Senate No. 3, with much interest and believe it is aimed directly at the more general education of the masses, a thing much needed in our present educational system. I shall be glad to know that the bill has favorably passed.

Mr. R. W. Allen, farm superintendent Oregon Agricultural College, Hermiston:

Your recent letter with Senate bill No. 3 inclosed has just been received. You have my most hearty indorsement of this bill, which so substantially supports and encourages the advance of vocational education throughout our entire Republic. The united efforts of the States and Federal Government will be able, through this measure, to accomplish what the Nation has been much in need of, namely, proficient means of industrial education in every part.

The American Association of Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations, of Portland:

Agriculture, including horticulture and forestry, should be a regular part of public secondary education. There should also be a limited number of special agricultural high schools in the different States. Special agricultural schools will fill a great need by attracting the more mature students who would not go to the ordinary high schools, and the ordinary high schools will have plenty of agricultural students of proper high-school age.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Hon. John K. Tener, governor of Pennsylvania, Harrisburg:

Senate bill No. 3, copy of which you were good enough to send me, was discussed and indorsed by the Pennsylvania State Board of Education. A letter was written to each United States Senator and Representative in Congress from Pennsylvania, and favorable responses were received from most of them.

Vocational education deserves every encouragement. I trust that the bill will become a law.

Mr. C. B. Connelley, dean school of applied industries, Carnegie Technical Schools, Schenley Park, Pittsburgh:

Replying to your communication of April 15, would state I want to thank you very much for your letter, and will say you can find me willing at any time to assist you in furthering your bill.

Mr. M. Friedman, superintendent United States Indian school, Carlisle:

I am tremendously interested in the Page bill for promoting vocational education in the American schools. I think it is one of the most progressive measures, as well as far-reaching, in the good it will do, that has been introduced in our Congress for many a year. Educators all over the country are interested in its successful adoption.

Mr. Thomas I. Mairs, professor of agricultural education, Pennsylvania State College, State College:

I want to thank you for the privilege of reading the Senate bill No. 3. I want to say that I am thoroughly in sympathy with the provisions of the bill. I sincerely trust that it will pass and believe that it will be of great benefit to our public-school system.

Mr. John P. Jackson, dean school of engineering, Pennsylvania State College, State College:

In reply to your letter and kindly action in reply to my telegram, I would say that I heartily support your measure and have already taken it before our American institute of electrical engineers educational committee, of which I am chairman, and have obtained their approval.

E. E. Powers, secretary of the Pennsylvania Rural Progress Association, Pennsdale, says:

We are all rapidly realizing the paramount importance of proper educational facilities as the main agent in eliminating the serious problems of country life. As the prime mover in bringing this question before the country as a concrete demand, we would like to have you speak, if possible, on the subject of the Page bill.

P. M. Tyler, principal Chester Agricultural High School, says:

Unable to attend conference, but we realize urgent need for the Page bill.

George M. Philips, secretary State board of education, West Chester, says:

The State board of education of Pennsylvania strongly indorses this movement and Senator PAGE'S bill, and at its direction I sent a letter, as secretary of the board, to every Senator and Representative in Congress from Pennsylvania. I very much hope that this measure will pass this winter. You will get valuable and important support from Pennsylvania.

Andrew Thomas Smith, principal State normal school, Mansfield, says:

I write to add my word of encouragement and to express the hope that the measure may be passed through Congress at this session.

It is a bill which will lend very great aid to a measure now occupying the chief place of attention among the educators of our country.

Mrs. L. L. Blankenburg, vice president General Federation of Women's Clubs, Philadelphia, writes:

Senator PAGE, you recognize the fact that women are not your constituents, except in six of the Western States, and that our wishes do not have much weight with Congress, but if there is sufficient publicity given to this bill I believe club women will use such influence as they can command to secure its passage.

Thomas F. Hunt, Pennsylvania State College of Agriculture, says:

For a number of years I have been deeply interested in the movement for the introduction of industrial training in the secondary schools of this country, as expressed in your bill. I believe it to be one of the most far-reaching movements for the progress of this country that has been before Congress in many years.

The editor of the Tobacco World, of Philadelphia, says:

Have given the bill hearty indorsement in editorial.

The Times, McKeesport, says:

A conference on Senator PAGE'S vocational bill is to be held in Washington, beginning with to-morrow. This measure is intended to provide a course of studies for the rising generation which is not now afforded in all of the public schools, and if the bill goes through Congress and becomes a national law its results should be very beneficial. This bill as an educational idea far transcends in importance all the political sparring of the session just opened, for it reaches down to the child upon whose life and efficiency national life and efficiency depend.

The purpose of Senator PAGE'S bill is to add vocational studies to our public-school system. It follows closely upon the idea of Senator Justin Morrill, predecessor of Senator CARROLL S. PAGE, of Vermont. Former Senator Morrill was the father of the so-called land-grant act of 1862, establishing the State colleges of agriculture and mechanic arts, and Senator PAGE'S bill is intended to carry down to the secondary schools industrial education which Senator Morrill's bill created in State agricultural and mechanical schools.

Combining all of the features of the bill, it can be said to be a unified movement to have the Government aid in adding vocational work in the public schools throughout the States. The bill should interest every father and mother and every employer who wish our schools to prepare young people more especially for definite profitable work. It should meet with almost universal indorsement throughout the entire country, as it is a good measure tending in the right direction.

Wilmer Atkinson, editor Farm Journal, Philadelphia, says:

We shall do what we can for the Page bill. I am glad the educators who met in Washington have indorsed your bill and will work for it.

Your bill commends itself to my judgment. While technical schools have been educating coordinately the hand and brain of the favored few of the land, the great mass of our youth are forced to begin the battle of life clumsily equipped for the struggle. Nowhere is technical training more urgently needed than on the farm and in the household. The demand of the time is for scientific efficiency, and this is the only lever that can lift agriculture to its rightful place.

The National Government can not spend money for a better purpose than in providing every normal boy and girl in the land with a fair and equal chance. A nation of efficient workers is a nation committed to universal peace and world-wide prosperity. The bill is a reform, and I hope that it will come quickly.

Mr. Paul Kreuzpointner, chairman committee on industrial education, American Foundrymen's Association, Altoona:

This matter of the industrial education of the masses of our industrial workers is of vital interest to the present and future material welfare of our industries, and therefore of our country, because the increase in population, the diminishing of our natural resources in quantity or quality, and the desirability to export our surplus products in competition with nations whose older civilization gives them advantages in certain directions, has created and is creating economic conditions which make it imperative to supplement the education of the few college graduates with the education of the many.

RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. E. E. Balcomb, of the Rhode Island Normal School, and secretary of the National Education Association, department of rural and agricultural education, and secretary of the national committee on agricultural education, writes:

Was very glad to get your letter and to note that you are not afraid to put yourself on record in favor of education as against battleships. Our committee hopes to carry on an extensive campaign favoring this bill.

Mrs. Helen C. Putnam, chairman committee on public school education, American Association for the Prevention and Study of Infant Mortality, Providence:

The purpose of the bill is in accord with our views, and I am inclined to believe that its details are likely to secure sound administration of the funds.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. J. E. Swearingen, State superintendent of education of South Carolina, Columbia:

Thanks for your courtesy in sending me a copy of Senate bill No. 3 as amended. These amendments greatly improve the measure. If the bill is enacted, it will be a statesmanlike and constructive piece of legislation.

D. B. Johnson, president of the Southern Educational Association and of the Winthrop Normal and Industrial College, Rockhill, says:

The condition of rural delivery can be improved best and more surely by relating the work of rural schools to the life of the people served by them. To do this elementary agriculture, home economics, and such practical subjects must be taught in the rural schools.

The interests of the agricultural classes demand the passage of this bill.

I have just returned from Houston, Tex., where the annual meeting of the Southern Educational Association was held and where I wrote and presented the resolutions which were adopted by the association. One of those resolutions indorsed the Page bill. I thought you would be glad to have this resolution, and I inclose you a copy.

The Southern Educational Association was attended by representatives of all the educational interests of all the Southern States, and the resolution indorsing the Page bill ought to have some effect with southern Congressmen.

E. J. Watson, commissioner of the department of agriculture, commerce and industries, Columbia, says:

I am in receipt of yours of December 7 inviting me to personally attend or send a representative to Washington to attend the conference on the Page bill. I regret that absence from the State prevented my receiving your letter in time even to send the night letter requested.

I wish to assure you that this has been in no measure due to any lack of interest in this important matter, for there is no more earnest advocate on secondary agricultural and industrial education to be found in the country than myself. In the future, if there is anything I can do in this or any other matter of equal importance to the South, I trust you will not hesitate to call upon me.

Mr. S. C. Mitchell, president University of South Carolina, Columbia:

I desire to express to you the deep interest that I feel in the success of the Page bill, Senate bill No. 3, seeking to promote vocational training throughout the Union. Speaking for the South, I desire to say that this is a matter of great importance, and I sincerely hope that you will be successful in your efforts to strengthen the agencies now at work for that cause. I shall be more than happy to do anything in my power to aid you to this end.

Dr. R. S. Wilkinson, president State Colored College, Orangeburg:

Your letter of February 16, describing the features of S. 3, known as the Page bill, revised and perfected up to date, received. Upon reading the same, I find that its provisions are broad and liberal, and that if passed it would increase wonderfully our opportunities of extension in agricultural instruction.

The measure has my hearty support and I shall do all I can to influence its passage.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Hon. R. S. Vessey, governor of South Dakota, Pierre:

I am in receipt of your favor of the 14th instant, transmitting report on Senate bill No. 3, and in connection therewith have to say, on behalf of the people of South Dakota, that, in our opinion, the measure presents a very vigorous and effective aid to the proper and best development of our youthful citizenship; hence it has our indorsement.

C. G. Lawrence, State superintendent of public instruction, Pierre, says:

Regret my inability to be present at meeting December 14; am in hearty accord with the general principles of Page bill, and shall do all in my power to help secure its enactment. Such a law will meet with general favor in this State.

Mr. J. H. Hetley, county superintendent of schools, Webster, says:

We have been trying in our weak way to aid the passage of your good measure, and a few of us are now looking about to see how we can best do more toward securing the passage of so fine a bill. Any suggestions you might be willing to give will be followed out as far as practicable.

We shall have the matter brought up at our Northern South Dakota Educational Association and perhaps have some resolution passed, but we think that this is not enough. Its measures are of vital interest to the future of our agriculture, and for this reason both our schools and our citizens will be greatly improved by the carrying out of its provisions.

The Page bill is good from my point of view. It will build up an immense corps of suggestive supervisors for the whole country. It will stimulate the agricultural movement and at the same time furnish some sane restraints upon the expenditure of public moneys.

Mr. J. W. Heston, president State Normal School, Madison:

I thank you for copy of your Senate bill No. 3, and report on same.

I am certainly interested in its passage and feel confident our entire congressional delegation will support the bill. Our Senator CRAWFORD is member of your committee and wrote me some time ago he was giving you all the help in his power.

I have been on national committee on agricultural education for several years, working for this or a similar measure, and I should be glad to do anything further in my power to secure its passage. I believe in every feature of the bill.

Mr. H. F. Patterson, superintendent Better Farming Association of South Dakota, Aberdeen:

A great deal of interest in better farming is being taken in this part of the State, and I believe that your bill will be the means of spreading this kind of work through each of the Northern States.

Mr. A. N. Hume, agronomy department, South Dakota State College, Brookings:

Although it is distinctly the function of the several States to provide for the education of citizens within their boundaries, it may well be a Federal function to assist the States. Any law providing for such assistance should be only restrictive enough to provide for the proper use of the funds. It seems to me that your bill embodies a number of the desirable features.

Mr. G. W. Nash, president Northern Normal and Industrial School, Aberdeen:

At a meeting of the Northern South Dakota Educational Association at Webster the committee on resolutions declared for your measure.

TENNESSEE.

The editor of the Progressive Teacher, Nashville, says:

I am ready and anxious to cooperate with you heartily and in every way possible.

Prof. Catharine A. Molligan, dean department of home economics, University of Tennessee, Knoxville:

It is with great pleasure that I indorse Senate bill No. 3, known as the Page vocational educational bill.

I am in favor of having home economics taught in every school in the United States.

TEXAS.

Mr. S. E. Mezes, president University of Texas, Austin:

Senate bill No. 3 appeals to me as a wise measure, conceived in a spirit of broad statesmanship. If it should become a law, as I hope it will, it would enable the Federal Government to cooperate helpfully and effectively with the States in improving the educational system of the country.

Mr. A. Caswell Ellis, professor philosophy of education, division department extension, Austin, says:

A copy of your bill on agricultural education, together with your letter, was handed to me by Prof. Sutton, on account of the fact that I have been especially interested in this matter both here and abroad.

Let me express my very heartiest commendation of this bill. I wish especially to commend the encouragement of agricultural and industrial education in our normal schools, so that we have a supply of teachers in our regular schools who are competent to teach these subjects and are in sympathy with them.

Really, the success or the failure of the secondary agricultural education rests upon the training and character of men who teach this subject.

I wish also to especially commend that feature in your bill which allows either special agricultural high schools or regular high schools with properly organized agricultural departments to secure the benefit of this appropriation.

I feel that I should apologize for intruding so much upon your attention, but the matter is one that greatly interests me and upon which I have done a great deal of work.

The editor of Farm and Ranch, Dallas, says:

It is a most excellent measure and one that is designed to stimulate education in behalf of the farms and those who most need this practical information.

The editor of the Texas Stockman and Farmer, San Antonio, writes:

Copy of your bill with view to promoting a better system of education along agricultural lines received. We will do all we can to aid you.

The Daily Texas Live Stock Reporter says:

We spend millions of dollars in teaching our children things that are of no practical value to them in the struggle for existence. We call them to do work that we give them no training for doing; we demand the tale of brick but we furnish no straw. Efficiency is value to the worker and to the Nation. The youth who goes out of school with a trained mind and hand is equipped for the battle that all must fight before success can be achieved. The money that is wasted in years of instruction in branches of learning that profits nothing because it is never applied would, if spent in teaching our children how to do things and the philosophy of practical affairs, count in making them more valuable as citizens and making us as a nation more forceful in the affairs of the world. Senator PAGE'S plan is the beginning of a change for the better that deserves the approval of all thoughtful men.

F. M. Bralley, State superintendent of education, Austin, says:

I have read Senate bill No. 3, recently received from you, and wish to say that the enactment of said bill into law would be of incalculable value to the educational interests of Texas and the entire country. I therefore heartily indorse the bill and express the hope that it will be given the support of every intelligent, patriotic Member of the United States Congress.

Mr. A. L. Paschal, superintendent Lubbock Agricultural Experimental Station, Lubbock:

I have read your amended Senate bill 3 and report, which you recently sent to me. I was very much interested in reading it and am very enthusiastic and anxious that it be unanimously adopted and enthusiastically put into practice. I heartily indorse it.

Mr. T. W. Buell, superintendent Denton Agricultural Experiment Station, Denton:

A copy of the report on Senate bill No. 3, and a copy of the bill, reached me the other day.

The optional feature is a good idea, as this gives States not yet in shape to utilize all features of the work an opportunity to avail themselves of things that may be used and a chance to later use the others. I approve it quite heartily.

I believe each State should be required to add as much to its share as it receives from the Government, but I believe you have practically so arranged the matter in section 6 of the act.

So far as I have examined the bill, it has my hearty indorsement.

Dr. J. O. Morgan, department of agronomy, Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, College Station:

In my opinion, this is an extremely important measure. The country is at present badly in need of just such help as your bill provides.

I think that the various State governments will gladly cooperate with the National Government in this further effort to advance agricultural and allied industries.

I am highly pleased with the bill and offer you my hearty support in furthering its success.

Rufus J. Nelson, editor Farm and Ranch, Dallas:

Our country could make no better investment than in training the boys to be producers and the girls to be home makers. A nation can rise no higher than the ideals of its citizens, and as the majority of our citizens must be producers it is the Nation's duty to educate and train her people for efficient production. Every dollar appropriated for industrial education will be an investment for this Government that will return dividends in products from our farms, factories, and mines, and the thousands of unfortunate boys and girls who are now unable to secure an education will be trained for citizenship.

Our schools do not now meet the needs of society. The tendency is now, and has ever been, to place emphasis upon the so-called art studies at the expense of industrial training. This is forcing thousands of bright boys and girls out of school annually. They become impatient to become breadwinners, because they recognize that the average high school or college course does not qualify them for a competence.

Industrial education will interest students because it trains for the everyday duties of life and makes efficient producers. Let us establish schools where boys and girls with but little means may become skilled producers and guardians of our domestic peace and prosperity.

I believe that it is our imperative duty to provide ways and means for training in the practical things of life those who are to live after us. Our own citizens who are to cultivate our farms, manufacture our products, operate our public-service utilities, should have an equal chance with those who come from foreign lands. It is our patriotic duty to invest the people's money in educational institutions where the people may be trained for industrial service. Failing to do this, will we not be responsible for social unrest, for anarchy, and for the diminishing returns in agriculture, which must inevitably follow unless our people be trained as breadwinners?

The Page vocational bill would be of inestimable benefit to us in Texas. We are an agricultural people, wholly dependent upon the products from our farms, but our people are not training their boys properly to produce larger crops and their girls adequately to make home life better. We have wonderful resources—farm products, timber, minerals, etc.—but our children are not taught manufacturing.

But the "back-to-the-farm" movement is being agitated, and our people want industrial and agricultural education for their children. The sentiment for vocational education is now apparent. This bill will make it possible for every boy and girl to secure industrial training.

I trust that you may have the hearty support and cooperation of the Texas delegation in Congress. I am sending a copy of this letter to our Senators and you may feel at liberty to quote all or any part of this letter if it will render you any assistance.

UTAH.

W. M. Stewart, principal of the State Normal School, Salt Lake City, says:

Our objection primarily is to the establishment of district agricultural schools of secondary grade and not to the other provisions of the bill. We believe strongly in industrial and vocational subjects as a part of the curriculum of the high school, but we think that the establishment of State district agricultural schools of secondary grade would be detrimental to our already established high schools. If this clause which provides for separate agricultural schools and experiment stations were eliminated, the bill would meet with our approval.

NOTE.—The views of Principal Stewart have been met by the elimination of that part of the bill which provides for separate experiment stations, but the provisions for district agricultural schools of secondary grade is regarded as so all-important to the cause of agricultural education that it has been continued in the bill, notwithstanding the protest of Principal Stewart.

VERMONT.

Hon. John A. Mead, governor of Vermont, says:

I have felt keenly for many years that in Vermont at least there was a great demand for increased facilities along agricultural and educational lines, and the conditions of said bill will afford the desired relief and where it is most needed.

My contention has been that the prosperity of our Nation more largely depends upon intelligent development of industrial agricultural life than to any other cause. Nature has been prodigal in her gifts to our State and Nation, and shall we exercise that industry and knowledge which will permit us to reap the bounty which has been placed at our door?

You are working along the right lines, and may your success equal your fondest anticipations.

Mason S. Stone, State superintendent of education, Montpelier, says:

As a financial measure it will be a wealth producer, as it will produce wealth producers.

As an economic measure it will eliminate waste through misfit service and greatly increase the efficiency of each successive generation.

As a just measure it will afford equality of opportunity to a million of boys by enabling each to discover the thing he can do best and by training him to do that thing the best he can.

As an educational measure it will neutralize the traditional and bookish education of the present and will train pupils to think, to do, to be.

As a civic measure it will greatly enhance the Nation's general intelligence, which is the guaranty of the Nation's peace, permanence, and prosperity.

As a moral measure it will produce individual industry and contentment, community cooperation and harmony, and national integrity and righteousness.

It is the most important bill for the development of the agricultural resources of the country that has ever been introduced since the Morrill bill.

Martin G. Benedict, principal St. Johnsbury Academy, St. Johnsbury, says:

The Page bill, a bill to cooperate with the States in encouraging instruction in agriculture, the trades, industries, home economics, etc., has received my careful attention. I fully and enthusiastically indorse its provisions and urge our Representatives in Congress to do their utmost to secure its passage.

The New England Farmer, Montpelier, says:

Senator PAGE'S bill is one of tremendous and far-reaching importance to the people of this country. Its enactment will open the door of opportunity for tens of thousands of American boys.

We need to make our educational system more practical. This does not mean that we are to cut out the essential features that form the foundation of our educational system, but it does mean that we ought to provide a system of study that will help our boys and girls to a greater degree to go forth and earn their own living. It is no secret that there have been a good many studies that have been of little practical benefit to the student, and have been forgotten almost as soon as the textbooks were closed and packed away.

Battleships and standing armies are not the only means of protection for a nation. Danger from a foreign foe is a remote possibility. Danger from ignorance, inefficiency, and poverty is an ever-present peril. The foes of our own household are to be dreaded more than any possible invasion from overseas. If every year we fit several million boys and girls by the study of manual training, scientific agriculture, and domestic science, we increase the wealth of the Nation by untold millions of dollars, because we make possible the earning of larger wages, the winning of greater profits, and the more economic expenditure of the earnings of the man who works with his hands. By increasing the possibility of securing more of the comforts of life we reduce thereby the army of the discontented, we lessen the number of misfits in our economic system, and we make our country a safer and a better place in which to dwell.

C. H. Spooner, president of Norwich University, Northfield, says:

I have given the bill a first reading. It does "look good" to me. May success attend you.

G. L. Green, principal Vermont State School of Agriculture, Randolph Center, says:

I am unable to be present at the conference concerning the passage of the Page bill, but I need not tell you that I am vitally interested in its passage.

This first Vermont State School of Agriculture is located in the home county of the late Senator Justin S. Morrill, father of agricultural education in the United States. Our school maintains a two-year course, which is intended to fit the farm boy for practical and intelligent farming. We are filling a gap between the high school and college. For the first time the farmers of the State have a school of secondary grade, established primarily for their benefit.

The appropriation which we have for the present year's use is far too small to establish our plant and provide even the beginnings of an equipment. Schools of this kind everywhere can not obtain State aid adequate to their needs, and any bill which Congress may pass which will help the cause along will be a great blessing to the Nation. May the Page bill speedily become an act.

Mr. Edward S. Abbott, principal Montpelier High School, Montpelier, says:

I have read with much interest the bill introduced by you in the Senate. It seems to me that it contains the elements of a mighty service to the Nation, in no way second to the Morrill law.

A. S. Harriman, principal Middlebury High School, Middlebury, says:

I have carefully read the copy of bill introduced by you, and cordially approve of a bill so wide in its scope and so salutary in its provisions for the welfare of industrial training throughout our country.

The following resolutions were adopted by the Vermont State Grange at its annual session December 12, 1911:

Whereas a safe, sure, and sound development of the country industrially, educationally, and morally needs impulse and encouragement; and

Whereas the agricultural conditions of the country are rapidly approaching a state demanding a greater knowledge and an intensive application of the science of agriculture on account of the occupation of nearly all available land and the constant increase in population: Therefore be it

Resolved by the State Grange of Vermont in its fortieth annual meeting, That we heartily indorse the vocational measure before Congress, with such modifications or amendments as will adjust it to various vocations, and urge its passage.

Mrs. Bertha M. Terrill, department of home economics, University of Vermont, Burlington:

Keenly interested as I am in every effort that looks toward the introduction of agricultural and home economic studies into our schools for the improvement of rural conditions of living, I am heartily in sympathy with your effort and hope it may succeed.

Philip R. Leavenworth, principal State Normal School, Castleton:

I am in receipt of your favor of February 29. I have examined the Page vocational bill and also the accompanying report on vocational education with much interest and pleasure. I can assure you that I very heartily approve of the bill in every respect, and trust that it will soon become a law.

I believe that if this bill becomes a law it will be the greatest forward step in education in this country that has been taken since the passage of the Morrill Act. If there is anything that I can possibly do in any way to help the good work along, please call on me.

VIRGINIA.

J. D. Eggleston, jr., superintendent of public instruction of Virginia, says:

This measure has been discussed by leading farmers and educators throughout the State of Virginia, and I am in position to know that the sentiment for it is very strong. My opportunities for observation have been unusually good, and I am safe in saying that were this measure put to a vote of our people it would be favored by an overwhelming majority.

H. F. Button, director Manassas Agricultural High School, Manassas, says:

I wish you all speed with the Page vocational school bill. We have conducted an agricultural school here four years with such success that 200 farmers testify to its value. We can not continue to grow without more money. The State can not support us; Congress can and should.

Dr. E. A. Alderman, president University of Virginia, Charlottesville:

The bill embodies a great idea, and if enacted into law will render an enormous service. I think you would do well, if I may venture to make a suggestion to you, to make provision in this bill for giving aid to the departments of education now existing in the State universities for the preparation of teachers for the secondary schools and for training men to direct the educational machinery of the State. Every American university, especially those in the South, has either inaugurated or is preparing to inaugurate such a department. One already exists at this university, and I venture to predict that in 10 years every State university will have an organized department of education, which will not be a normal school and would not be so recognized. There will be, however, work of incalculable value in invigorating the whole school system. Is it not possible for you to remedy this defect in your bill, if I may take the liberty of so calling it? The bill would then seem to me to be an unusually powerful and well-thought-out scheme for the development of the educational life of the Nation.

NOTE.—The bill has been so amended as to meet these criticisms of President Alderman.

Mr. J. L. Jarman, principal State Female Normal School, Farmville:

Yours of the 29th ultimo is received. I have kept up with the Page vocational bill since it was first offered and am thoroughly in sympathy with it in every detail.

Mr. Hervin U. Roop, president Eastern College, Manassas:

I have read your bill with much interest and certainly think you are on the right track. I am a firm believer in vocational education. Every Senator and Representative in Congress should support the Page bill.

Mr. J. H. Johnston, president Virginia Normal and Industrial Institute, Petersburg:

Your letter of the 29th of February has been received. In reply would say I have read very carefully the bill known as the "Page vocational bill" and think it very worthy of consideration and an early passage. We feel very grateful for your efforts toward passage of same, as general benefits will result to all the schools.

P. S.—I hope the delegation may give united support.

Dr. N. S. Mayo, Virginia Agricultural Experiment Station, Blacksburg:

I have read very carefully Senate bill No. 3 on vocational training. Many years' experience as a teacher in agricultural and mechanical colleges and a lecturer at farmers' institutes in extension courses convinces me that this bill will do more to advance the interests of the producing classes in the United States both in a material and educational way than anything else I can conceive of. I believe that this bill will add immensely to the welfare and well-being of the Nation. I congratulate you upon your foresight in the preparation and introduction of this bill. It certainly should become a law.

Julian A. Burruss, president State Normal and Industrial School for Women, Harrisonburg:

Replying to your letter of February 29 relative to Senate bill No. 3, known as the Page vocational bill, I beg to say that I, together with our entire faculty, are in entire accord with the purpose of the bill, and shall be pleased to do everything we can to secure its passage. We have already written our representatives in Congress urging its support.

WASHINGTON.

Henry B. Dewey, State superintendent of public instruction, Olympia, says:

I have very carefully examined Senate bill 3 and wish to give it my unqualified indorsement in every particular. I hope that the bill will pass substantially as printed without material amendment. It means more, in my judgment, for the youth of this country than any other bill now pending in Congress. It is the first definite step toward a redirect education.

O. L. Waller, vice president of the State College of Washington, Pullman, says:

We are very much in hopes that before Congress adjourns some good bill providing for actual demonstration to the farmers and sons of farmers will be enacted into law. We have at this institution calls for men to do this kind of work that are far beyond the means we have to take care of such calls. We have not appropriation enough at present to either employ the men or provide the equipment for such work to meet such demands. I shall prepare to write you at a later date concerning Senate bill 3, and shall seek an opportunity to look it over more carefully. But you may be very sure we are greatly interested in some legislation looking to actual services along the line of better farming conditions.

Mr. C. A. Tonneson, editor Northwest Horticulturist, Tacoma, says:

Your kind favor of recent date and copy of your bill was duly received in time for comment in our August issue. The measure you propose is along the lines we have been agitating for several years past, and therefore will be glad to cooperate with you in an endeavor to get final action on this bill.

The Horticulturist believes a measure of this kind enacted would help solve some of the perplexing problems of the day. Theory and speculation have been rampant in this country. Early training industrially will continue to make us strong in all the noble qualities for which the American Nation became noted a generation ago.

Mr. N. D. Showalter, principal State Normal School, Cheney:

I believe this is one of the best measures that has ever been presented along this particular line. I feel that Federal aid in these particular lines will stimulate very largely the activities of the States to put the work on a good basis. All educators are very much interested in the trend of educational thought, more practical ideas, and I feel that our Commonwealth would be very much benefited by the improvement which is sure to come through the aid of this measure.

May I say further that I shall be glad to cooperate in every way possible, and if there is anything that I can do to further the interests of this bill I shall be only too glad to do so.

Mr. W. E. Wilson, principal Washington State Normal School, Ellensburg:

Yesterday we had a visit from nine superintendents from western Washington. At a dinner served to them with the members of our faculty and our board of trustees by our domestic science department, the Page bill and its value to this State was discussed and a resolution was proposed strongly urging the Representatives from this State to support the bill.

The more I consider the provisions of the bill and the results that would surely follow the enactment of the measure the more do I appreciate the value of it as an educational measure. It seems to me that the bill is very wisely constructed. It provides for the preparation of teachers of these practical subjects and for securing in the country schools equipment for the education of children for country home life. If the United States does this it will place itself clearly in the front rank of nations in the matter of providing for the general education of the people in matters nearest to their interest and welfare.

Mr. Fred W. Lewis, secretary Washington State Grange, Tumwater:

To the Members of Congress from Washington:

HONORABLE SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES: At the last session of the National Grange the matter of vocational education was brought up, and after due deliberation it was decided to urge the adoption of the Page bill, known as Senate bill No. 3, as being a step in the right direction.

It is foolishness to cram our children's brains with matter that can be of no value to them in after life and allow their hands and minds to remain entirely untrained for the duties that will be theirs during their lifetime of effort to obtain a livelihood for themselves and their families.

It will not be possible to give thorough education along any line of endeavor, but it is possible to give an idea of the fundamental principles of all of those vocations which are the bases of the lifework of all our working people.

Washington State Grange wishes to urge upon you that you use your best endeavor to gain the adoption of this law, and as we represent the wishes of over 16,000 members, consisting of farmers and their families, we feel that you will take thought of our wishes in this.

The expense connected with this law, if put into effect, is very small when compared with the great number that will be benefited by it, and although the figures look great, yet when divided between those who will pay it, will be very small.

Hoping this may meet with your approval and that your best efforts will be exerted in the effort to make this bill a law, I remain.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Hon. William E. Glasscock, governor, Charleston, W. Va.:

I have not had the time to give as much thought to your vocational bill as I would like to, but am profoundly impressed with the wisdom of such legislation and the great good that a law of that kind will do for a great majority of the people of this country.

I am sure that West Virginia would take advantage of such a law, and I can think of nothing that would be more encouraging to our people as a whole than the aid that is proposed to be given by the Federal Government to agriculture and kindred subjects.

M. P. Shawkey, State superintendent of public instruction, Charleston, says:

I have studied quite carefully Senate bill 3 and find myself unable to improve upon its contents.

West Virginia is just now entering upon a determined campaign for bringing it into its own industrially, and especially agriculturally. We find the financial burden of such a project is somewhat embarrassing, and that Senate bill 3 will extend to us the strong hand of the Government. I most heartily indorse the bill and believe that its passage will prove to be a master stroke of legislation.

Our State supervisor of high schools, Prof. L. L. Friend, is much interested in this measure and is writing you his opinion, which you are at liberty to use if you so desire.

Thomas E. Hodges, president West Virginia University, Morgantown, says:

Yours of December 4, addressed to the State Agricultural College, Charleston, has come to me.

I most heartily approve the general purposes of Senate bill 3, a copy of which accompanied your letter.

The Association of Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations, at its recent meeting at Columbus, Ohio, gave their indorsement to the general proposition for Federal aid for instruction in agriculture and mechanical arts and domestic science in secondary schools and for Federal aid to the State colleges of agriculture for extension.

Mr. Thomas C. Miller, principal Shepherd College State Normal School, Shepherdstown, says:

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 5th, together with a copy of Senate bill 3, which you have introduced in that body. I give it my most hearty approval. As a member of the national agricultural executive committee, I shall be glad to do anything I can to further the measure and should be glad to come to Washington at any time I can be of any assistance.

L. L. Friend, supervisor of high schools, Charleston, says:

I have been watching with much interest the fortunes in Congress of the Page bill, providing for the appropriation by the Federal Government of funds to promote the teaching of agriculture in high schools and normal schools. The most important educational movement now in progress in this country is the movement for the betterment of rural education. The Page bill, if passed, will prove of incalculable benefit to this movement.

WISCONSIN.

Mr. J. W. Crabtree, president State Normal School, River Falls:

I thoroughly approve of Senate bill No. 3. The agricultural colleges and the experimental stations of the United States have done and are doing a great work. I would favor the Nation's making still greater provision for those institutions than has been done in the past, but it seems to me your bill desires to render a more valuable service and a kind of service that can not be rendered by the higher institutions.

Your bill has in mind getting at this whole thing at its very foundation and of giving every child such a notion of agriculture and other vocational studies as to at least lead him to appreciate the wisdom of his going further in those lines.

Mr. A. H. Cole, principal Lincoln County Training School, Merrill:

This bill meets my hearty concurrence. If there is anything that I can do to assist in the passage of this bill, I shall be glad to do so.

Duncan McGregor, private secretary of Gov. McGovern, of Wisconsin, says:

I am directed by Gov. McGovern to express to you his unqualified approval of the purpose of bill 3, Sixty-second Congress, first session, introduced by yourself on April 6, 1911.

Charles McKenny, president State Normal School, Milwaukee, says:

I have your letter of December 7 inviting me to a conference December 14, 15, 16, at Washington, D. C., to consider the Page bill (S. 3). I regret that previous engagements prevent my being present at the conference. I want to say that I am in sympathy with the general provisions of the Page bill.

Mr. A. A. Johnson, superintendent Milwaukee County School of Agriculture and Domestic Economy, Wauwatosa, says:

I am very much interested in the bill you have introduced contemplating Federal aid for secondary agricultural education in the various States. I hope it will pass.

The editor of the Butter, Cheese, and Egg Journal, Milwaukee, says:

We fully appreciate the importance of greater educational interest along agricultural and home economic lines, and we shall endeavor to aid the cause to the best of our ability. We assure you of our hearty support.

John F. Sims, State Normal School, says:

This measure, in my opinion, is a most desirable one for the whole country, as the questions involved are the most important in present-day needs. The bill, if made law, will stimulate the scientific study of agriculture, make the farm more attractive and more profitable, and encourage a wholesome move back to the country.

Henry E. Miles, chairman of the committee on industrial education of the National Association of Manufacturers, says:

The present common-school system is cultural; practical matters are no part of its aim, nor can they be made a part. Less than one-half of our children go beyond the sixth grade; only 1 in 3 completes the grammar school course; only 1 in 5 enters the high school; only 1 in 30 graduates from the high school. Half of the children leave school at the age of 14. The Wisconsin bureau of labor, in its report for 1910, declares that only 12 per cent of the children employed under 16 years of age are in positions where they can learn a trade.

Germany apparently prefers that the great body of her children shall enter the industries at the age of 14. The point is that Germany goes into the industry with the child; the hand of the child is kept within the hand of the State. The school to which he goes is called the continuation school, for in this school his education is continued. In the continuation school only the science and art of the trade is taught. The child there learns the relations of his particular factory task to the whole of his industry. He is taught scientifically the higher reaches of his industry, and up to the limit of his ability is made an accomplished and scientific factor in his industry.

A. A. Johnson, principal La Crosse School of Agriculture and Domestic Economy at Onalaska, says:

I feel that your bill, as I understand it, will be a great aid to the development of the agricultural resources throughout the United States.

Prof. Ely, of Wisconsin, declares:

Industrial education, not for the few but for all people, for every boy and girl born in the United States, without one exception, is the chief economic demand of our times.

Comparatively little is attained by picking a few here and there and elevating them above the masses by technical schools. We want to extend the benefit of industrial schools to all alike.

Mr. W. A. Clark, principal Eau Claire County Training School for Teachers, Eau Claire:

Your letter of the 29th ultimo with the copy of the Page vocational bill and the report on vocational education were duly received.

I am interested in the purposes which this bill seeks to accomplish, particularly in the preparing of teachers for vocational courses in the State College of Agriculture, for which there is great need.

I also believe the many expenditures for the encouragement of instruction in agriculture in the secondary schools will be a splendid investment for the Nation. I find nothing in the bill to which I would take exception.

WYOMING.

Emeline S. Whitcomb, professor household science University of Wyoming, Laramie:

Your bill has my hearty indorsement. I believe it will help more than any other existing measure along educational lines to help people to help themselves.

EXTRACT FROM THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION OF THE NATIONAL GRANGE AT ITS MEETING IN COLUMBUS, OHIO, 1911.

The grange has ever stood for the highest and most thorough teaching of the young in the common schools, not only in the usual branches, but especially in the elementary principles of domestic science and agriculture, and we believe that in a nation depending so largely upon agriculture as a basis of wealth as does the United States every child should be taught the basic principles of this science of agriculture.

LAW OF MASSACHUSETTS RELATIVE TO INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION.

SECTION 1. The governor, by and with the consent of the council, shall appoint a commission of five persons to be known as the commission on industrial education, to serve for the term of three years, and to receive such compensation as the governor and council shall approve. The said commission on its organization shall appoint a secretary to be its executive officer, who shall not be a member of the commission and who shall receive such salary as shall be approved by the governor and council; and the commission may employ supervisors, experts in industrial and technical education, and such clerical and other service as may be found necessary. The necessary expenses of the commission, including clerk hire, traveling expenses, stationery, and all other incidental expenses, shall be paid out of the treasury of the Commonwealth, as may be provided by law, but shall not exceed the sum of $8,000 for the remainder of the present fiscal year.

SEC. 2. The commission on industrial education shall be charged with the duty of extending the investigation of methods of industrial training and of local needs, and it shall advise and aid in the introduction of industrial education in the independent schools, as hereinafter provided; and it shall provide for lectures on the importance of industrial education and kindred subjects, and visit and report upon all special schools in which such education is carried on. It may initiate and superintend the establishment and maintenance of industrial schools for boys and girls in various centers of the Commonwealth, with the cooperation and consent of the municipality involved or the municipalities constituent of any district to be formed by the union of towns and cities, as hereinafter provided. The commission shall have all necessary powers in the conduct and maintenance of industrial schools, and money appropriated by the State and municipality for their maintenance shall be expended under its direction.

SEC. 3. All cities and towns may provide independent industrial schools for instruction in the principles of agriculture and the domestic and mechanic arts, but attendance upon such schools of children under 14 years of age shall not take the place of attendance upon public schools as required by law. In addition to these industrial schools cities and towns may provide for evening courses for persons already employed in trades, and they may also provide, in the industrial schools and evening schools herein authorized, for the instruction in part-time classes of children between the ages of 14 and 18 years who may be employed during the remainder of the day, to the end that instruction in the principles and the practice of the arts may go on together; Provided, That the independent schools authorized in this section shall be approved as to location, courses and methods of instruction by the commission on industrial education.

SEC. 4. Two or more cities or towns may unite as a district for the maintenance of the industrial schools provided for in the preceding section, but no such district shall be created without the approval of the commission on industrial education.

SEC. 5. Whenever any city or town or any district, as provided in the preceding section, shall appropriate money for the establishment and equipment and maintenance of independent schools for industrial training, the Commonwealth, in order to aid in the maintenance of such schools, shall pay annually from the treasury to such cities, towns, or districts, a sum proportionate to the amount raised by local taxation, and expended for the support of schools for each thousand dollars of valuation, as follows: Cities and towns expending more than $5 for each thousand of valuation for the support of public schools to be reimbursed by the Commonwealth to the amount of one-half, those raising and expending between four and five dollars per thousand to the amount of one-third, and those raising and expending less than $4 per thousand to the amount of one-fifth, of the cost of maintaining industrial schools: Provided, That no payment to any city or town shall be made except by special appropriation by the legislature.

SEC. 6. The commission on industrial education shall make a report annually to the legislature relative to the condition and progress of industrial education during the year, stating what industrial schools have been established and the appropriations necessary for their maintenance, in accordance with the preceding section, and making such recommendations as the commission on industrial education may deem advisable; and especially shall the commission consider and report at an early day upon the advisability of establishing one or more technical schools or industrial colleges, providing for a three or four years' course for extended training in the working principles of the larger industries of the Commonwealth.

SEC. 7. The trustees of the Massachusetts Agricultural College are hereby authorized to establish a normal department for the purpose of giving instruction in the elements of agriculture to persons desiring to teach such elements in the public schools, as provided in sections 3 and 4: Provided, That the cost of such department shall not exceed the sum of $5,000 in any one year, and that at least 15 candidates present themselves for such instruction.

SEC. 8. Section 10 of chapter 42 of the revised laws and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed. (Approved June 21, 1906.)

In 1908 the term of the commission created by the foregoing act was extended to five years and its powers and duties were enlarged, as indicated in the following:

"The commission shall have all necessary powers in the conduct and maintenance of independent industrial schools, and money appropriated by the Commonwealth or by municipalities for their maintenance shall be expended under its direction or with its approval. Any city or town may also establish independent industrial schools in charge of a board of trustees, which shall have authority to provide and maintain such schools. Such schools, if approved by the commission on industrial education as to location, courses, and methods of instruction, shall receive reimbursement as provided in section 4 of said chapter 505.

"Any resident of Massachusetts may, with the approval of the commission on industrial education, attend an independent industrial school, as provided for in this act, located in any city or town other than that in which he resides, provided there is no such school supported in whole or in part by the city or town in which he resides, upon payment by the city or town of his residence of such tuition fee as may be fixed by said commission; and the Commonwealth shall repay to any city or town one-half of all such payments. If any city or town neglects or refuses to pay for such tuition, it shall be liable therefor in an action of contract to the legally constituted authorities of the school which the pupil attended under the approval of said commission."

In 1909 section 5 of the law of 1906 was amended to read as follows:

"Upon certification by the board of education to the auditor of the Commonwealth that a city, town, or district, either by moneys raised by local taxation or by moneys donated or contributed, has maintained an independent industrial school, the Commonwealth, in order to aid in the maintenance of such schools, shall pay annually from the treasury to such cities, towns, or districts a sum equal to one-half the sum raised by local taxation for this purpose: Provided, That no payment to any city or town shall be made except by special appropriation by the legislature."

By another act passed in 1909 the commission on industrial education was consolidated with the State board of education and its powers were transferred to the new board thus constituted. Sections 1 and 2 of this act follow:

"The board of education shall consist of nine persons, three of whom shall annually in April be appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of the council, for terms of three years, except as hereinafter provided. The members of the board shall serve without compensation. During the month of June in the current year the governor shall so appoint all of said nine members of the board, whose terms of office shall begin on the 1st day of July, 1909, three for terms ending May 1, 1911, three for terms ending May 1, 1912, and three for terms ending May 1, 1913. Four of the present members of the board of education and one of the members of the commission on industrial education shall be appointed members of the board of education provided for by this act.

"The board of education shall exercise all the powers and be subject to all the duties now conferred or imposed by law upon the present board of education, or upon the commission on industrial education by chapter 505 of the acts of the year 1906 and by chapter 572 of the acts of the year 1908, and acts in amendment thereof and in addition thereto, except as may otherwise be provided herein."

During the delivery of Mr. PAGE'S speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CATRON in the chair). The Senator from Vermont will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 20182) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the indutries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Vermont will proceed.

At the conclusion of Mr. PAGE'S speech,

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the most interesting and instructive address of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], to which we have just listened, may be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor is entered.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cummins	Lorimer	Smith, Md.
Bailey	Curtis	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Bourne	Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Briggs	Fletcher	Myers	Stephenson
Bristow	Gallinger	Oliver	Stone
Brown	Gardner	Page	Sutherland
Bryan	Gore	Perkins	Swanson
Burnham	Gronna	Rayner	Thornton
Catron	Heyburn	Richardson	Townsend
Clapp	Hitchcock	Root	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Johnston, Ala.	Simmons	Wetmore
Crawford	Jones	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Cullom	Kern	Smith, Ga.	Works

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 315, submitted by Mr. LEA, May 20, 1912, as follows:

Resolved, That corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States from the State of Illinois, and that his election was therefore invalid.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, in determining the value of conflicting testimony in any case it is important that we take account of the incident or event respecting which the testimony is given.

There is here a vast volume of conflicting testimony. So, before discussing the evidence of witnesses, I thought it might not be unprofitable if we considered briefly the circumstances attending this election; not only that, but the political conditions which existed in the country and occupied the public mind at the time of the election. In other words, that before introducing the actors in this drama we should attend to the proper setting of the scenery and the arrangements of the stage.

Let us, then, look, if you please, to the political conditions that prevailed in this country in the spring of 1909 and see if we can arrive at the mental processes of political leaders and voters during that period. There had been a presidential election in the November previous. There had been a heated and exciting campaign, in which the tariff question was one of the principal issues. In every part of this country previous to the convening of the national conventions men and women were discussing the high cost of living, and it was believed by a great many men, of both parties, that the tariff taxation of this country had something to do with the high prices of which the people complained, and so when the Republican national convention met at Chicago the conditions in that regard were so pressing upon the Republican Party that that national convention was driven to adopt a platform upon the tariff question which was, as shown by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] the other day, essentially different from any platform ever before adopted by that party.

It was driven to declare in favor of a revision of the tariff as it then existed, and when the convention had adjourned the attention of the public was called to the fact that while the platform declared in favor of tariff revision there was no indication as to whether that party pledge referred to revision upward or revision downward, and public sentiment was so acute on that subject, the question of the high cost of living so engrossed the public mind, it was so talked about everywhere, that the Republican candidate for President of the United States was driven to declare that by the only proper interpretation to be placed upon that platform it declared for a revision downward and not otherwise.

So, when the Republican Party came into power the following spring it was pledged to a revision of the tariff downward, taking for granted, of course, that the great standard bearer of that party had authority to declare in favor of that interpretation of the national platform.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator would not claim that the national convention left anything to be determined by the candidate as to the platform of the party, I hope.

Mr. KERN. That has very frequently occurred.

Mr. HEYBURN. It had adjourned.

Mr. KERN. Very often in the political history of this country the presidential candidate of each party has been called upon to and has not hesitated to place an interpretation upon different planks of different platforms that were regarded as so ambiguous as to need interpretation.

Following the convening of Congress, which was called in special session by the President of the United States in accordance with a promise to that effect made by him to the people, there ensued a battle royal on the tariff question. The Payne bill had passed the House. I am now speaking of the conditions which existed throughout the country at the time of the election of Mr. LORIMER to the Senate in May, 1909. The Payne bill had passed the House. It was being considered in the Senate. The attention of the country was attracted to one of the most splendid contests ever waged in any forum. There were ranged on one side an element of the Republican Party headed by that gifted son of Iowa, Jonathan P. Dolliver, of whom it has been said that he gave up his life for the cause of tariff reform. There was his distinguished colleague from Iowa and other Republican Senators with whose names the country is familiar who rallied under the standard of the people and joined with the Senators on this side of the Chamber in seeking to bring relief to a tax-ridden people.

The attention of the country was fixed upon Washington. The fight here was the subject of conversation in every neighborhood in the land between these oceans. There had not been a subject so universally discussed since the close of the Civil War. It was the engrossing topic everywhere. That contest was so close in the vote upon many schedules and promised to be so close upon others as to increase the attention of the public and intensify public interest.

I want to call your attention to that exciting condition as shown here by one of the chief witnesses for Senator LORIMER in this investigation. I refer to the testimony of Edward Hines, who was one of the chief factors in this election. Mr. Hines testified that he as a friend of Senator LORIMER and as a friend of the high protective tariff as interpreted by the standpat leadership of the Republican Party—and I use that term in no offensive sense—had been approached by these men and urged to use his influence in the election of a Republican Senator from Illinois of the right kind to the end that another vote might be added to aid in the passage of those schedules that were being pressed by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Aldrich.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Will the Senator kindly give us the page of the testimony?

Mr. KERN. I will. I read from page 814. Speaking of a conversation first with Senator PENROSE, he said:

He—

said at that later date that Senator Aldrich was very much interested, because there were certain schedules in the Payne-Aldrich, or Payne tariff bill I think it was classed, which looked very doubtful if they would be able to pass in the Senate, and he wanted every Republican vote possible, and was very anxious that a Republican be elected from Illinois.

Again on page 815, questioned by Senator GAMBLE, he said:

Do you recall the particular schedule or schedules referred to?

Mr. HINES. No; I do not. He said that it was a very close vote on certain schedules. I did not particularly inquire what particular schedules they were. I knew at that time, from my being here, that there was more or less talk of the vote being very close on certain schedules.

Again on page 817, speaking of the conversation with Senator Aldrich—this was at a later date—he said:

He—

said that there were several schedules coming up in the Senate—they were either up or were coming up, I am not certain which—that it was very important to have every Republican vote possible to assist in the passage of.

There are other extracts from this testimony which I might read, but that will be sufficient to show the condition here as understood by the friends of Senator LORIMER.

This condition of affairs in Washington was also the subject of earnest discussion at Springfield at that time—at the very moment of the election and the week preceding the election. I desire to read from Senator LORIMER'S testimony, volume 8, page 7863. He was questioned by myself:

What I was trying to find out was whether or not there were many of the Democrats who suggested to you the pendency of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, who gave that as a reason for being against you or hesitating to vote for you?

Senator LORIMER. A great many Democrats said that they could not vote for a man who held my views on political questions.
Senator KERN. Did they refer to the bill as these two men did?

And I will refer to the testimony of these two men directly.

Did they refer to the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill that was then pending in Congress?
Senator LORIMER. I think that was the subject of discussion about that time, Senator.
Senator KERN. Pretty generally?
Senator LORIMER. Yes.

He also, in his testimony on the preceding page, tells how one Democrat who voted for him begged him to cast just one vote for tariff reform so as to make it easy for him to vote for him—Senator LORIMER—and how another man importuned him to cast one vote with LA FOLLETTE, and he told them both very frankly and in a very manly way that he would not vote except as a Republican and a protectionist Republican.

Lawrence B. Stringer, the Democratic nominee, a man who carried every precinct in Illinois at the Democratic primaries, a man whose candidacy had been unanimously indorsed by the Democratic State convention of Illinois, was there pointing out this very situation in Washington, pointing out to them how the Republican leaders at Washington wanted the second vote from Illinois, and how it was in the interest of every Democrat and tariff reformer in the land to be in favor of only one high-protective-tariff Republican from Illinois.

It was further shown by the testimony that there were 24 faithful and loyal Democrats in that legislature who formed an organization, and went about there day after day and night after night begging these men who were about to desert them to remain true to the party platform, pointing out to them this condition of things at Washington, how the reforms for which the Democratic Party had fought for 50 years might be defeated by that one vote that was about to be sent from Illinois, pleading with them that if a Republican was to be elected, some Republican should be elected who would come to Washington and stand with Dolliver and LA FOLLETTE and CUMMINS and BORAH, and that splendid little band of men who made a fight in that session that will go down into history. They begged them not to aid the enemy in the battle then in progress between the upward and the downward revisionists of the tariff.

This was the political condition. At that time there was only one Republican Senator from Illinois, and Senator Aldrich was sending word there that there must be two. Why? To vote against the Democrats and progressive Republicans. On the other side every loyal Democrat in the land, high and low, every Republican who sympathized with the progressive Senators in that great battle, was equally interested that no more men of the type of the Senator from Rhode Island should at such a juncture enter the Senate. All such men agreed that if a tariff-reform Republican could not be elected, then Illinois should have but one vote instead of two.

It was at that particular juncture, with that state of feeling at Washington, with that condition of things at Springfield, with the public attention thus engrossed, that the country was startled by the news that 53 Democrats had joined with a like number of Republicans in the Illinois Legislature and had given to the Senate two Aldrich Republicans instead of one, and had elected the most ultra of all Republican leaders, the high priest of protection, the most powerful of all the machine magnates in the central West, to a seat in this body. From every neighborhood in the land between these oceans there was raised a cry of righteous indignation, not alone because of party perfidy, but the deliberate betrayal of a principle for which the united Democratic Party and hundreds of thousands of progressive Republicans throughout the land then stood, and that, too, at the supreme hour of conflict. It was not a surrender. It was as if a regiment of Washington's Continental Army had voluntarily marched into the British camp and sworn allegiance to the British King, claiming that it was for the advancement of the cause of American independence.

Of course there was indignation, and of course there was suspicion. In the natural order of things in these latter days men do not betray party or principle in that way under those circumstances save for money, and without further evidence the suspicion was deeply rooted that wholesale bribery had been resorted to in order to bring about that result.

But a little later, when the conditions were understood better, when it was learned that in Springfield the air had been foul with the odors of corruption for years, how bribery was regarded there as a pastime, how honesty and decency had become subjects of jest; when it was learned how the splendid nominee of the Democratic Party had earnestly pleaded with the deserting miscreants; when it came to be known that that little band of which I spoke awhile ago had argued for days with their faithless colleagues, pointing out the condition of affairs at Washington, and that one standpat Republican Senator was infinitely better than two, and that these 53 men had under these circumstances deliberately and advisedly deserted to the enemy, then that which had been a suspicion ripened into earnest belief, so that afterwards, when the confessions of guilt came and the evidence of wholesale corruption piled mountain high, then the belief took form of—

* * * confirmation strong
As proof of Holy Writ.

As a part of this preliminary stage setting, before the entry of the actors, let us have a picture of the prevailing legislative condition at Springfield in 1909 and for years previous. It is conceded broadly that within a stone's throw of the old Lincoln home, almost within the shadow of his tomb, scenes of political debauchery had been carried on for so long a time that the principal actors had become so emboldened as to seize upon the name of Lincoln and conjure with it to the end that their offenses might be condoned by the vast multitude of honest men who revere his memory. It was so conceded by at least one member of the present committee of investigation in his argument to the Senate on a previous hearing. I read from the speech delivered by the distinguished senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE], and I beg the attention of Senators now particularly to these extracts from that speech as throwing light upon the subject under discussion. He said:

Mr. President, it has been my purpose to state the evidence given before the committee fairly as to bribery or corrupt practices as affecting the votes cast for United States Senator. I am not here to give countenance to or to approve the proceedings, the record, or the methods pursued in the Legislature of the State of Illinois. The evidence is uncontradicted that a system of corruption and malfeasance has been practiced for many years in the legislature of that State. It appears money has been coerced and received by members of the legislature for unlawful and unworthy purposes. Money appears to have been demanded and received for the promotion or defeat of legislation irrespective of its merits, and the funds so secured have been held or retained and the same distributed to members of the legislature after adjournment.

Again, the Senator from South Dakota said:

The evidence, it appears to me, was overwhelming—

I ask you to consider that language in the light of certain language that is in the report of the majority of the committee here—

The evidence, it appears to me, was overwhelming from many witnesses upon the stand, both directly and indirectly, that the matter of the jack pot had been in existence and in operation for some years. It appears to have been reduced in its operation practically to a system. I had never heard or learned of its being inaugurated elsewhere to the extent that funds raised or paid to affect legislation irrespective of its merits were held and pooled and later distributed at the close of the legislative session.

Afterwards in answer to an inquiry the distinguished Senator said:

Because, as I have said, the existence of a jack pot was testified to by many witnesses, and very early in the hearing—and very early in the hearing its existence was practically admitted, as far as it could be, by the respective counsel upon either side of the case.

At the conclusion of this hearing, with the meager testimony secured by the former committee strengthened at every point and buttressed by new evidence all along the line, the same Senator joined in the majority report which declares that whether corruption existed in the General Assembly of Illinois of 1909, or in previous legislatures affecting general legislation is a question about which it is difficult to secure definite information. Evidently the admissions made by counsel on both sides of the case at the former hearing, the overwhelming evidence, as he termed it, then adduced had been forgotten by the genial and accomplished Senator when he signed the present majority report.

George W. Hinman, of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, which paper is Senator Lorimer's organ, if I may use that term, testified before the committee on this subject and he declared his opinion and belief on that subject in no uncertain way. I quote from his testimony, volume 1, page 203:

It is my opinion and belief that there was a jack pot, and the editorials—

That had been referred to—may have indicated that.

Senator KENYON. What was the jack pot for?
Mr. HINMAN. Well, I could not tell you. I have never handled a jack pot or been in a jack pot or seen a jack pot. If you wish a full answer I would say it has been the common report and matter of opinion and belief that there has been a jack pot in every session of the legislature since I have been in Illinois.
Senator KERN. What do you understand by a jack pot in that sense?
Mr. HINMAN. I understand money sent down to a legislature, not specially the Legislature of Illinois, but any legislature—I think in New York State, where I came from, it is called the Black Horse Cavalry, the venal crowd in a legislature. I mean some money that is sent down there for the purpose of influencing members as regards their votes on legislation.
Senator KERN. Sent by whom?

Mr. HINMAN. Well, men who are likely to be affected by legislation that is pending.

Senator GAMBLE. And this money is raised to influence their votes one way or the other?

Mr. HINMAN. I judge so, sir.

Senator GAMBLE. And contributed by different interests, either favoring or disapproving legislation?

Mr. HINMAN. Yes.

* * * * * * *

Senator KENYON. You have a pretty firm belief in the existence of this jack pot?

Mr. HINMAN. That is my opinion and belief.

He goes on to say:

Mr. HINMAN. I think that common report has existed in fairly strong shape, and for every legislature that has been in Illinois since I have been there—12 years (p. 205).

Ex-Gov. Richard Yates (pp. 1–220) testifies that—

The general subject of money being used to influence legislation, or to prevent the passage of legislation, has been talked about, joked about, and seriously talked about, I suppose, for 30 years; and I, of course, have heard men talk to one another about what would simply be hearsay.

I want to call attention to an incident related in Gov. Yates's testimony which I think is really pathetic. I will not take the time to read it. I think I can state the substance of it. I have it here. He testifies that the speaker of the Illinois Legislature, whose name was Miller, who was his personal friend, came to him in 1903 and told him he had been offered a bribe of $200,000 to expedite the passage of the notorious Mueller bill; that, on the governor's advice, he publicly exposed the offer to the legislature, whereupon the house appointed an investigating committee and put Miller on trial and censured him for offending the dignity of that body. Gov. Yates said:

Mr. Miller went home and died not long afterwards.

And he adds:

I had no doubt of the truth of his story. His wife told me that unquestionably—

I will read the whole of that part of Gov. Yates's testimony. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] asked the question:

You have not any doubt as to the truth of Mr. Miller's statement, have you?

Mr. YATES. I have no doubt of its truth; there is no reason why I should doubt it.

Senator JONES. And anybody who knew Mr. Miller would not doubt it?

Mr. YATES. No, sir.

Senator JONES. You were his personal friend?

Mr. YATES. You are absolutely right. If this is a hearsay hearing, I will state that the last time that I was in McLeansboro, which was his home and where he lies buried, his wife told me that unquestionably his death was caused by the mortification and humiliation inflicted upon him because the house, instead of seeking to investigate this matter, had proceeded to try him.

Senator JONES. I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Yet this distinguished senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] hesitates not to affix his signature to this majority report.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. LORIMER. Does the Senator know that the present governor of the State of Illinois, Gov. Deneen, and the newspaper combination of the city of Chicago, which is now prosecuting this case against me, were the men responsible for the outrage on Speaker Miller at that time?

Mr. KERN. I did not know it; but if——

Mr. LORIMER. They were the men who persecuted him and drove him to his grave.

Mr. KERN. If the Senator's statement is true, it only accentuates the proposition I was just making—that at Springfield at that time and for many years there existed a condition of things so disgraceful as to shock the conscience of every man who cares anything about the country or its institutions.

It is a matter of no consequence to me, so far as this prosecution is concerned, who was engaged in the corruption. I was speaking about the poisoned air of Springfield, not the question as to who had poisoned it. If both wings of the Republican Party had engaged in it, so much the worse. If they had Democratic allies—and as to that I have no doubt—so much the worse for the great, splendid State of Illinois, the State of Lincoln and of Douglas.

I was about to say that, notwithstanding this statement of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], expressing the fact that he had no doubt of the truth of this tragic story so graphically told by Gov. Yates as to the representatives of Illinois having driven a good man to his death because he had the courage to stand for honesty and fair dealing, he permits himself to sign a report here which says that "there is no evidence of corruption in previous legislatures," or words to that effect.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. To whom does the Senator refer in saying that?

Mr. KERN. I refer to the majority report, which I quoted a moment ago. To be exact, I will read it again:

Whether corruption existed in the General Assembly of Illinois of 1909 or previous legislatures, affecting general legislation, is a question concerning which it is difficult to secure definite information.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will ask the Senator if he knows of a single witness who testified of his own knowledge that it did exist? In asking that question I want to make this explanation: I think a fair consideration of the majority report will show that they have presented that question on the evidence, and have presented it fairly, quoting from newspaper publishers, from Gov. Deneen, from Speaker Shurtleff, and from others who professed to have most knowledge of the subject, and every one of them saying they had no personal knowledge of it. They had reason to believe. I will say, further, Mr. President, before the Senator answers that question, I believe it myself.

Mr. KERN. Why in the world——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I shall probably go fully as far as the Senator from Indiana in the expression of the belief that previous to 1909, for several years, there had been corruption in the Legislature of Illinois, but the point that we make in our report is that the jack pot that existed in 1909 we do not think was connected with Senator LORIMER's election, but was a legislative jack pot formed to control the legislation of that session.

Mr. KERN. The report expressed the opinion of the majority just as I read it; and if the Senator believes it is apparent from the circumstances of the case, from the circumstantial evidence, that this corruption existed all these years, as he now says, it would have been very easy to have written it into his report, instead of saying that accurate information on that subject could not be procured.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have written it in this report.

Mr. KERN. Let me answer the Senator's question. The Senator asked me whether there was any evidence of a jack pot in 1909. The majority of this committee has been driven to the confession of it in another part of their report.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. KERN. Wait till I get through with this. The Senator asked me a question.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Let the Senator be fair with me. The quotation that he has made, as I understand it, comes from that part of the report that precedes the discussion of the jack pot in 1909.

Mr. KERN. I have been discussing jack pots of the previous years for the purpose of showing the condition that existed at Springfield at the commencement of that session, and I called attention to the fact; and I call attention again to that expression in the report which says, in effect, that there is no evidence of any jack-pot corruption previous to 1909.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not think the report says any such thing.

Mr. KERN. Just allow me to finish the answer to the Senator's question. He asked me if I had any evidence or had heard of any evidence of a jack pot. I heard the confessions of four men that they had received money out of a jack pot; and the majority of the committee, as I said a moment ago, in its report has been driven to declare that there was some kind of a jack pot in 1909; and I will show you where. Senators will remember——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. So far as I am concerned, the Senator need not show me where, because I have advocated that idea and have quoted the evidence in this report.

Mr. KERN. Very well. Just let me proceed. The Senator asked me a question.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. But I do not like to be put in the false position here that we are trying to hide that fact, because I believe it, and I believe it sincerely.

Mr. KERN. Well, then, if there was that belief, why was the sentence thrown into your report to convey precisely the other idea?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. As the question is addressed to me, I will say this: After we had examined Gov. Deneen particularly, who was impressed with the truth of the fact that there had been a jack pot in previous sessions of the legislature—he had gone on the stump in Illinois and had alleged it and attempted to substantiate the fact—he brought his speech into the committee room and would have been glad to read it to us, and yet when he had finished all of his testimony on that point he used this language:

But that he does not know that it is based on facts at all (1123); that he never made an investigation and had no power or facilities to do so (1123).

He believed it, and he gave his reasons for believing it, but he had no facts upon which he could base his belief and state it as a fact. I believe it just as he believed it; but in making a report to this Senate the committee believed that they should present it in judicial form and state what the facts are. They have given Gov. Deneen's testimony on that point.

Mr. KERN. I confess that I can not understand why this statement was put into the report if that belief existed; but I will say that I think my friend the Senator from Vermont does believe that there was corruption existing up to that time and through the session of 1909. I accept his word. How does he happen to believe it? Because he sat for six or eight months on this committee and listened to the evidence in the case, and from a thousand different circumstances that developed in the evidence, that belief fixed itself firmly in his mind, as it has fixed itself firmly in the minds of ninety millions of people in this country out of one hundred millions. That is why; and that is one fault I have to find—and I say it not in a censorious way—with the majority report. With them it seems there is no such thing as circumstantial evidence; that there is no bribery proved unless the briber and the bribed both come before the committee and confess their crime. I believe in, and I think all lawyers understand, the value of circumstantial evidence. It is the combination of circumstances shown by the proof which drives conviction home to the heart of every man who hears it of the truth of the proposition in dispute. My friend the Senator from Vermont has come to this conclusion, because he has learned the circumstances of the case and has been driven to that conclusion, as has everybody else.

The Senator from Vermont asked me a moment ago a question, which I started to answer two or three times, but was diverted by his courteous interruption; that was as to whether I could name any proof of the existence of a jack pot that had been shown in this investigation. I was about to say that the majority of the committee had been driven to admit the existence of something like a jack pot in trying to explain the money that was paid by John Broderick to D. W. Holstlaw in the city of Chicago. I intended to speak on that subject later on, but since the Senator has asked the question, it is more convenient, perhaps, that I should speak of it now.

Senators who were present during the debate on this question in the last Congress will doubtless remember the able and almost vicious assaults that were made upon the testimony of Senator Holstlaw. One of the strongest arguments made in the defense was the effort by a distinguished Senator to show the falsity of Holstlaw's testimony, the effort to show that there had been a deposit slip manufactured to order for the purposes of the case, and that that circumstance indicated that Holstlaw had not received $2,500 from Broderick at all, nor had he received the other payment, as he claimed, of $700. I think that a very large proportion of Senators upon this floor were very deeply impressed with the argument made on that subject; yet in this investigation the evidence was piled up so high on that proposition as to dispel every doubt on the question.

Let me give you a synopsis of that evidence: First, Senator John Broderick, the intimate friend for many years of the Senator from Illinois. a saloon keeper on the West Side, in Chicago, denied that he had ever asked Holstlaw to come to his place of business; that when Holstlaw came there in June or July, at the time when Holstlaw claimed that he was paid $2,500, certain of his friends were present all the time and that he paid no money at all to Holstlaw on that visit. Referring to the next visit in August, when Holstlaw claims that he had been paid $700 in the same saloon by the same man, Broderick denied that he had ever been there at all; he denied that at any time he had ever sent for Holstlaw or had ever written him any letter requesting his presence in Chicago.

As to the $2,500 transaction, the president of the State Bank of Illinois, a man of splendid character, whose word would not be questioned, testified that Holstlaw came to his bank a stranger and introduced himself to him; that Holstlaw's bank at Iuka and the State Bank were correspondent banks; that he took Holstlaw to the teller of the bank and introduced him; that the teller of the bank made out a deposit slip for the $2,500, and he saw the money. Then came the other officers of the bank, one by one, and testified that Holstlaw's story as to that was absolutely true. That is the first transaction.

As to the $700 transaction, Senator Broderick on the witness stand was asked, "Was Holstlaw ever in your saloon again?" "No; never; he had no business there." "Did you ever send for him to come there?" "Why, of course not. What would I send to him to come there for? I had no business with him." "Did you write to him?" "I did not." Thereupon the counsel for the committee presented to him a letter in his own handwriting addressed to D. W. Holstlaw, urging him to come to his saloon on the very day that the $700 was paid, and to come before 4 o'clock, because he was going on a trip to the West. When that letter was thrust in the face of Senator Broderick the question was asked him, "Is that your writing?" "Yes." "Did you write it?" "I must have written it." "Why did you write Holstlaw to come on that day?" "I do not know; I have no recollection at all." As the proof of perjury thus overwhelmed him he was unable to make further explanation.

The officers of the bank in Chicago then again testified—and the books show it and it is reported by the expert accountants of the committee—that on that very day D. W. Holstlaw in person deposited $700 in currency in the State Bank of Chicago. That is why the majority of the committee are driven away from the report of the Burrow's committee, which utterly discredited the testimony of Holstlaw. They report the fact back to you that Holstlaw did receive $3,200 from Broderick, but they say they are absolutely unable to understand why Broderick should have paid Holstlaw $3,200 unless it can be explained by the following circumstances:

1. That the brewery interests of the State had raised a fund.

2. That Holstlaw, having spent a large sum of money in his campaign, and being a parsimonious man, expected and demanded reimbursement from the brewers.

3. That Broderick was a saloon keeper, therefore probably in touch with the brewers and more likely than anyone else to act as their agent in paying over the money which they had furnished, or might have furnished, to make Holstlaw whole.

There is, however, not even a supposition on the question as to why the money was paid in two installments.

Is there evidence to that effect? There is direct evidence to the effect that John Broderick had told Holstlaw, "If you vote for LORIMER, there is $2,500 in it." There is evidence further that the $2,500 was "Lorimer money." Why go into the field of speculation? Why become converted to the doctrine of circumstantial evidence in one instance and not in any other? And yet, notwithstanding the facts which I have just given the Senate, the majority of the committee declare in their report that absolutely no material new evidence has been offered in this last investigation.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Does the Senator claim that the money that was paid to Holstlaw was what is called "jack-pot" money, in the meaning of that term, or was that an independent transaction, so far as the evidence shows?

Mr. KERN. So far as the evidence shows, there were two payments made all along the line—that is, the "Lorimer money" that was paid by Lee O'Neil Browne to Beckemeyer, Link, and Luke at St. Louis; the "Lorimer money" that was paid first by Senator Broderick in Chicago; and the evidence shows that about a month later, in each instance, came what was called the "jack-pot" money, and nobody seemed to know what it was for or the source from whence it came. If it was "brewery money" put into the hands of Senator John Broderick, even for reimbursement in two installments, it would be in the nature of a jack pot—not in the sense perhaps that some of us understand that term, but in the political sense in which the term is used in Illinois.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I simply interrupted the Senator because I wanted to understand what the Senator's attitude was on that matter—whether he concluded that that was a part of what is commonly called the "jack-pot" money at that session, or whether it was an independent transaction like Holstlaw's other independent transactions, when he admitted taking $1,500 from a firm for his vote on furnishing the statehouse? That, I think, will be conceded to be an independent transaction, will it not?

Mr. KERN. I think all those transactions would savor very strongly of the jack-pot odor. Now, I think I have answered the Senator as to the existence of any so-called jack pot, and I have not come yet at all to the evidence of the four men who testified positively and without equivocation that there was jack-pot money received by them, and who testified with equal positiveness that they were paid money before that time by Senator LORIMER's accredited agent, Lee O'Neil Browne, in consideration of their votes in the senatorial election. If I had time I should like to read you some newspaper accounts of that senatorial election that were put in evidence by Senator LORIMER, and thereby stamped with credibility. I will have occasion to refer to them a little later on, but I think for the present I will pass them.

In concluding this preliminary part of the discussion I want to call the attention of Senators to some figures. I have already said that Senator Hopkins was the Republican nominee for Senator. There were 390,000 Republican votes cast at the primary—nearly 400,000—and there were four senatorial candidates—Hopkins, Mason, Foss, and Webster. Hopkins's plurality over Foss was 47,000; over Mason, 81,000; and over Webster, 153,000. Not only that, but, as I said awhile ago, at the Republican State convention in Illinois, with every county in the State represented, a resolution was unanimously adopted recognizing the validity of the primary and declaring to the world that A. J. Hopkins was the candidate of the Republican Party in Illinois for the United States Senate. I have already stated that Lawrence B. Stringer was nominated by the Democratic Party in the same way, receiving 150,000 Democratic votes, and carrying every precinct in the State of Illinois, according to his testimony.

I call your attention to this other preliminary fact, that of the 202 members of the Illinois Legislature—I believe that is the correct number—76, or more than one-third, came from the city of Chicago and Cook County. There were 47 Republicans and 29 Democrats, and of the 29 Democrats—God save the mark—Senator LORIMER received 25 and of the 46 Republicans he received 27, the total vote for Senator being: LORIMER, 108; Hopkins, 70; and Stringer 53.

We now have a general view of the situation in Washington and a glimpse of the conditions at Springfield up to the time of the election. Senator LORIMER was bitterly opposed to the election of Hopkins and testified that his opposition was generally known throughout Illinois. He was on the ground in Springfield every week, as he testifies, from January 27 until the electon on May 26. His advocacy of the deep waterway does not explain this continued presence for the reason, as he testifies himself, that there was an absolute and square deadlock between the two houses on this subject, one house holding tenaciously to Gov. Deneen's view of the situation and the other house holding with equal tenacity to the view of Senator LORIMER; so that there was not even a vote on the proposition of the waterway during that entire session.

He was there, and, genial and mild-mannered man that he is, his was the master mind dominating that situation; and no other conclusion can be drawn by any man who impartially reads the testimony in this case. His hand was the guiding hand. He testifies to his efforts for the election of Gov. Deneen, not because he loved Deneen, but I think the inference is irresistible that he desired the election of Deneen to the Senate because he desired the removal of Gov. Deneen from the office of governor. Failing in that, then came the events to which we will now address ourselves.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. LORIMER. I think it is only fair that the Senator should not misrepresent my attitude with reference to trying to elect Gov. Deneen United States Senator. I doubt if the Senator will find anything in the record that will indicate that I was for Gov. Deneen because I loved him. When you look the record carefully over, you will find that I said I thought his election would be in the best interest of harmony in the Republican Party. There never has been any pretense that I favored his election because I was in love with Gov. Deneen.

Mr. KERN. No; I understood that; and I understood further that the Senator testified that the lieutenant governor, a son or grandson of the late Gov. Oglesby, was his friend. I think I understood him to testify to that.

Mr. LORIMER. Yes; I testified that Gov. Oglesby was my friend; and, if I testified on the subject at all, I also testified that I did not support him for lieutenant governor; but he was my friend in the sense that he is the friend of every other Republican in the State of Illinois, and he had practically no opposition in his election, as the returns show.

Mr. KERN. I can not now go hunting through this vast volume of testimony, and I will not even controvert the matter with the Senator; but the testimony is unquestionably clear that at a certain period in these events Senator LORIMER ceased advocating the claims of Gov. Deneen, who constantly refused to be a candidate, and that some time after that—how long I can not now tell, but perhaps a week or two or three before the election—there began to be talk of a movement started in his behalf, as shown by the testimony of Edward Hines and others.

But, passing from that, and as further illustrating the conditions surrounding this election, I call attention to the testimony as to the conversations and conduct of several Democratic members at that time. We are looking for light now on the question as to how this strange, unaccountable, unprecedented thing happened. I grant you that there have been times when Democrats have voted for Republicans and Republicans have voted for Democrats in senatorial elections and in other elections; but I challenge any Senator here to find me a time in the history of this country when any considerable number of Democrats voluntarily went over and voted for a Republican or any considerable number of Republicans went over and voted for a Democrat when the issue was so well defined, when the excitement was so high, and when the very air was so vibrant with the talk of the people about the things that were happening in this Capitol—I challenge them to furnish me a parallel case, when under such conditions there was such party perfidy, such wholesale shameless betrayal of principle. The testimony of these conversations and this conduct will be of particular interest in view of the statement in the majority report that no new testimony of a material character has been developed at this hearing.

Fred E. Sterling, editor of the Rockford Gazette, a Republican journal—a splendid specimen of young manhood as he appeared upon the witness stand, with steady nerve and a clear eye—a man of great intelligence—testified that on the Sunday before the senatorial election James H. Corcoran, Democratic representative, who voted for LORIMER on the final ballot, told him that LORIMER would be elected that week and that the fellows were getting offers of money for their votes as high as $2,500—the precise amount paid Holstlaw—that on Monday Corcoran told him that Senator LORIMER would be elected on the next day, Tuesday; but that on the following day Corcoran informed him that the election would not occur on that day because "Manny" Abrahams, whose name came first on the roll call of the house, would not break the ice for $2,500; that on the next morning, which was the day of the election, Corcoran said to him:

> It is going over this morning; they came across to Abrahams; you watch; he will be the first to break the ice.

Representative Corcoran in his testimony did not deny these conversations with any degree of positiveness; he did not remember them; and said, if they occurred, they were based on rumor. He testified, however, that during those days—this is the testimony of Corcoran—prior to the senatorial election "the air was full of rumors of corruption."

Henry Terrill, a merchant of Colchester, and a Republican member, swears that on the day before the election John Griffin, Democratic member from Chicago, asked him if he would not support LORIMER, whereupon he asked Griffin what there would be in it, and Griffin responded, "A thousand dollars."

Of Griffin's relations to LORIMER the Senator himself testified as follows:

> I have known John ever since I can remember almost, and his political friends were warm personal friends of mine. The leading Democrats in the senatorial district were for me and John was for me. I think John would have been for me whether his friends suggested it or not.

It is not necessary to say that Griffin, as I remember, contradicts this testimony, as every malefactor connected with this affair, whose hands were dirty with corruption money, denied all complicity in or knowledge of any wrongdoing.

Jacob Groves, a Democratic member, testifies that Douglas Patterson, a Democratic politician of more or less prominence, came to his room after midnight the night before the election. Groves had retired and had been asleep. Patterson asked him if he was a Mason or an Odd Fellow. Groves responded that he was an Odd Fellow. Patterson then said he could trust him with a secret, and then went on and told him that about 42 Democrats were going to vote for LORIMER next day and wanted Groves to do so, and said it would probably be a good thing for both of them to get it made unanimous. Groves seemed to be an old-fashioned kind of Democrat; he did not like to be disturbed in his sleep at that time of night. On account of the time of the visit, because of Patterson's language and manner, Groves thought the proposition was a corrupt one. On this subject he testified:

> I thought he was trying to bribe me, and I began talking loud. Patterson says, "I am not trying to bribe you; talk low; put down that transom." I said, "I don't care who hears me." He then backed out.

Mr. Groves referred to this incident in his speech on the roll call in the senatorial election, and his testimony is not denied, so far as I have been able to investigate the record.

Groves also testified that Representative Donahue told him that any man making a speech for LORIMER would get more than a thousand dollars. The orators were at a premium. Donahue, who says he thinks there was some corruption in the election, but not as much as he once thought there was, testified that he did not remember making the remark to Groves—that is, he did not remember making it seriously to Groves.

Charles Hedge, a white barber of Hinsdale, swears that Representative Lantz, a Democrat, told him on a train a week or so before the election that some Democratic representative, whose name witness did not recollect, asked him (Lantz) if he ought to take a thousand dollars and vote for LORIMER, and that Lantz said he told him that if he was that cheap he ought to go to Joliet, which is the seat of the penitentiary.

Lantz swears that while he knew Hedge, and had been riding with him backward and forward on trains, and talking with him while so riding for several years, he has no recollection of talking with him about the senatorial election and positively denies making the statement attributed to him.

Lantz was a civil-service commissioner in 1900, and he says he credited his appointment to LORIMER. Senator LORIMER testified that Lantz, who voted for him, lives in his congressional district; that he understood Lantz voted for him every time he ran for Congress; that he is a very warm personal friend; and that he had recommended him for a position on the civil-service board.

W. S. Lawrence, a real estate dealer of Fairfield, testified that he had talked with Senator Womack on a train in the fall of 1909 regarding the senatorial election. I quote from Mr. Lawrence's testimony:

I said it was the impression in my country that the election was purchased. Womack said, "There is no question about it. I was told I could get a thousand dollars to vote for LORIMER.

Senator Womack's version of the conversation is as follows:

I told Lawrence that money was probably used; that I did not know; that I believed if I had trained with that crowd I might have known about it and got a thousand dollars, or whatever was portioned out.

Womack also testified that he discussed the question of rumored corruption with Scott, a member, on the day of the election. Scott said that there was a rumor that Democrats were being paid. Womack said he had heard so. One or the other asked how much they were getting, and Scott said he had heard that they were getting a thousand dollars, but did not know. He says they were not very serious—just laughing and joking. Just laughing and joking about the purchase of a Senatorship in the great State of Illinois!

John M. Peffers, formerly Senator Hopkins's private secretary, now a lawyer of the Illinois bar, apparently a young man of high character, certainly of good appearance, testified that Representative McCormick told him that he had been offered $2,500 to change from Hopkins to LORIMER. Senator McCormick, who was a very eccentric witness, to say the least, denied this conversation.

Benjamin F. Moore, who in 1909 was the Republican sheriff of Wabash County, testified that on the night before the senatorial election he was in Springfield, and that W. C. Blair, of whose testimony I shall speak at length by and by, was there in the hotel declaring his loyalty to Stringer, the Democratic nominee. The following day Blair voted for LORIMER. Mr. Moore testified that within a month after the election another conversation occurred on a train, when the sheriff was bringing some prisoners up to some State institution, and that Blair, doubtless explaining his change of attitude, said to him:

I would have been very foolish to have voted for Stringer and let all of the Lorimer money go by and not get my part of it.

Charles A. White testified that on the day before the senatorial election, John H. De Wolf, of whose testimony I shall speak at length hereafter, a Democratic member, asked him, "Have you been up to the trough yet?" adding, with an oath, "Well, I have already been up to the trough and got mine." I will show you before I get through this discussion that De Wolf's statement that he had received his was most probably true. De Wolf testified he did not remember that conversation, but if such a thing was said it must have referred to going up to the bar to drink, because he said that was a very common expression of his; that when he spoke about going up to the bar, he always spoke about going up to the trough, and if he talked to White in that strain and asked him if he had been up to the trough, he meant to ask whether he had been up to the bar, and he said that he had been up to the trough himself, meaning up to the bar.

I want to call attention to the testimony of George W. Meyers. That testimony was offered in the former hearing. It bears directly on this case. In my judgment, taking it in connection with the evidence offered to contradict it, it fixes absolutely the truth of the charge that Lee O'Neil Browne was buying votes in Springfield for Senator LORIMER whenever and wherever he had the opportunity. I propose to show you before I get through that the bond of union between Senator LORIMER and Lee O'Neil Browne was well-nigh indissoluble, in so far as this election was concerned.

George W. Meyers testified that about 20 minutes before the roll call on the day of the senatorial election Lee O'Neil Browne sent for him to come to his desk. He went there to the desk of his leader. Browne said to him, "We are going to put this over to-day, and I would like for you to vote with us." Meyers replied, "I can not do it, Lee." Then Mr. Browne said, "There is some good State jobs to give away yet, and plenty of the ready necessary." Meyers replied, "I can not afford to do that."

What are you going to do with that kind of testimony? Is there any doubt about what he meant?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If the Senator will allow me, did Meyers vote for Senator LORIMER?

Mr. KERN. No; he did not vote for LORIMER. I was not undertaking to show that they bought George Meyers's vote. I was undertaking to show that the effort was being made by Lee O'Neil Browne to buy votes everywhere that the opportunity presented itself. Remember, Mr. Meyers is a banker in a little town in Illinois. No attempt was made to impeach his reputation for honesty or truth. Mr. Meyers testified that he came at Mr. Browne's request in front of Mr. Browne's desk. That is a serious piece of testimony, and it was necessary to get rid of it in some way. There was no gainsaying the fact of Mr. Meyers's credibility and standing. So there is brought before the committee a young man by the name of Paul McCann, a page in the legislature, and he is made to testify, or he testifies, that he stood by the side of Mr. Browne's desk during the hours of the preliminaries of that day and the vote, and he knows that no man came to Mr. Browne's desk that day during that time.

George Alschuler, who sat near by, said that in the two intervening hours of excitement such as had never been known in Springfield before he did not see anybody approach Lee O'Neil Browne's desk, and that if anyone had come there within those two hours he would have known it. That testimony is very important, because it goes right straight to the point, and if the testimony of George W. Meyers is true, then it settles this case.

I spoke awhile ago about some newspaper account of the scenes attending the election of United States Senator having been put in evidence by counsel for Senator LORIMER, thereby giving those newspaper accounts the stamp of credibility. I come now to a description of the meeting of that morning. I want to lay before the Senate the scenes that were taking place there during the hours when young Paul McCann says he watched everybody who came to Browne's desk. "Contending forces in camp" is the subhead of the article from which I read:

At 10 o'clock, when the senate and house met in formal session, the two contending forces were in camp on opposite ends of the rotunda of the statehouse. Mr. LORIMER had his headquarters in the speaker's room, the approaches guarded by trusted scouts, and runners flying in every direction bringing in the wabbly legislators who had not declared their intentions since 3 a. m.

Former Senator Hopkins established his camp on the senate side of the capitol, conferring with his major generals and lesser lieutenants in one of the senate committee rooms.

Then comes an account of the "Tip for Lorimer try out."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Will the Senator tell me the page to which he is referring?

Mr. KERN. The pages I expect to read from before I get through are pages 7505 to 7518, in volume 8. Listen to the account of what was going on there:

The Lorimer aids were scurrying hither and thither, checking up for the final show-down. The Hopkins people appeared to be sitting tight. Mr. Hopkins had left his headquarters following the departure of the senators and had taken a position on the side lines near the judiciary committee room of the house.

Mr. LORIMER was receiving reports each minute within the rooms of Speaker Shurtleff. Behind Speaker Shurtleff, on the rostrum, sat former Gov. Richard Yates, intensely interested in the proceedings. The committee clerks and legislative attachés crowded into the space in front of the seats of the members.

Not another person could have been crowded into the galleries of the house. Almost every politician of note in the State was among those present. Springfield turned out as it would to a gala society event. Everybody appeared to be present, when the pages began to hustle in chairs for the accommodation of "the honorable the senate."

Going on a little further, when the speeches commenced, there is an account in this same article (page 7513 of the record) of a fist fight that took place on the floor of the house. Fisticuffs enlivened the proceedings. But let us go back a little further:

There was a terrific racket at the door just as Browne reached this point in his appeal, and the tall form of Representative Chiperfield was seen hastening down the aisle.

"Mr. Speaker," demanded Chiperfield, with a voice quivering with anger, "I demand that this floor be cleared of those persons who are not entitled to be here."

He referred to former Lieut. Gov. William A. Northcott, now United States district attorney for this Federal district. Mr. Northcott was elbowing his way through the crowd which fringed the rear of the house. There was a rush of members to the rear, while Mr. Northcott started for the Democratic cloakroom.

Then the fight to which I have referred followed immediately afterwards. Paul McCann, the young man referred to, was standing by the desk of Mr. Browne, and he says that he can testify as to anyone who might or who might not have approached during every minute of that time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KERN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Lee O'Neil Browne, I understand, was the leader of one of the Democratic factions?

Mr. KERN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This transaction that the Senator is speaking about occupied how long—two or three hours?

Mr. KERN. The whole proceedings?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; during the time this young man claims he was standing at Browne's desk.

Mr. KERN. Does the Senator mean the proceedings there that day?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I understand the Senator, McCann testified that he had been standing by Mr. Browne's desk for a considerable length of time. Was that the entire day?

Mr. KERN. Throughout the proceedings. As I remember Mr. Alschuler's testimony, it covered a period of two hours.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And McCann was there the same length of time?

Mr. KERN. I do not remember whether McCann gave the time or not. It is but fair to say that Mr. Meyers stated in his testimony that this was about 20 minutes before the roll call commenced.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. During that time speeches were being made?

Mr. KERN. Twenty minutes before the roll call?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; during the two or three hours that this witness testified nobody approached Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne's desk.

Mr. KERN. During the two or three hours that Mr. Alschuler testified about, there must have been speeches made, because there were speeches made all through the roll call.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wanted to get the situation in my own mind. As the Senator understands the testimony, just what was going on in the legislative assembly during the time when this young man says he was standing by Mr. Browne's desk and the other man, Mr. Alschuler, stood near him?

Mr. KERN. In the first place, the senate had marched across to the house, at noon, or about 12 o'clock. Then, as I understand from Mr. Meyers, there was something of a delay. There was a roll call of both houses, as I remember it, and after that there were speeches made. Now, Mr. Meyers testifies that this occurred 20 minutes before the roll call. Whether that was a roll call of the house or senate I do not know; nor do I know which occurred first, but I can get the testimony of Mr. McCann, if the Senator likes, and read what he says on that subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not want to divert the Senator from his discussion, but I wanted to understand that exact situation.

Mr. KERN. My purpose in reading this newspaper account was principally to show the excitement attending the scenes of that day. There was much confusion. A large crowd was there. There was excitement on every hand, every minute of time; aids were scurrying backward and forward, and Senator LORIMER was receiving the reports in the speaker's room. That was during the time this young man testified about.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will state to the Senator the thought which occurred to my mind: Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne was the leader of one of those factions. I do not know how many members belonged to that faction.

Mr. KERN. He had more than the other factional leader. He had about 35 or 36.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He had a large number. Here was a matter going on that was a great concern. It would have been, to my mind, somewhat remarkable if no member of his own faction during that time approached his desk.

Mr. KERN. It would be utterly incredible—with the hurrying and scurrying of aids and the rush and push of the adjutants of the generals that is here described.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the hour of 5 o'clock has now arrived and the Senator from Indiana has been speaking since a little after 3 o'clock. I suggest that we take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. I thank the Senator. I was about to make the same suggestion. I should like to take up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill and proceed with it as far as we can. So I ask unanimous consent to take up that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. KERN. For what purpose?

Mr. WARREN. To take up the appropriation bill. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. KERN. Oh, no; I have not finished, but I have concluded for the day.

Mr. WARREN. That is what I meant—for the day.

Mr. KERN. I shall desire, Mr. President, to continue my remarks at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Senator from Wyoming to indulge me for a moment, that I may give a notice to the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I desire to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the notice.

The notice was read and ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

Notice is hereby given by Mr. BACON that after the expiration of the time prescribed by the rule of the Senate he will propose the following amendment to the standing rules of the Senate, as expressed in the following resolution (S. Res. 331) to be introduced by him for said purpose, to wit:

"Resolved, That Rule XII of the standing rules for conducting business in the Senate of the United States be amended by adding, at the conclusion of paragraph 1 of said Rule XII, the following words, to wit:

"'When upon the call of the yeas and nays less than a quorum of the Senate shall vote upon the pending question, the names of the Senators not voting shall again be called, and pending the call of the Senators not theretofore voting it shall be competent for the Senate to proceed to secure the attendance of absent Senators, as provided in Rule V of the standing rules of the Senate.'"

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 24023, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill where it was left off yesterday.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill at page 34, line 13.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 34, line 16, after the word "each," to insert "Director of the Consular Service, $4,500; counselor for the Department of State, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $7,500; resident diplomatic officer, $6,500, to be appointed by the Secretary of State; eight officers to aid in important drafting work, four at $4,500 each and four at $3,000 each, to be appointed by the Secretary of State, and to be employed upon tariff, treaty, and trade relations and negotiations, any one of whom may be employed as chief of division of far eastern, Latin American, near eastern, or European affairs, or upon other work in connection with foreign relations; Assistant Solicitor, $3,000; law clerk, $2,500; clerks—one of class 4, three of class 3, two of class 1, three at $1,000 each; three assistant messengers; for meeting occasional and unforeseen expenses arising in connection with foreign trade relations which come within the jurisdiction of the Department of State under tariff legislation and otherwise, and in the negotiation and preparation of treaties, arrangements, and agreements for the advancement of commercial and other interests, including the appointment of necessary employees at the seat of government or otherwise, to be selected and compensated under the provisions of the said act of August 5, 1909, $25,340," so as to make the clause read:

For Secretary of State, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, $5,000; Second and Third Assistant Secretaries, at $4,500 each; Director of the Consular Service, $4,500, etc.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the word "said" be stricken out in line 14, page 35. It is there by an error.

The SECRETARY. In line 14, page 35, before the word "act," strike out the word "said."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is all new matter here. It seems that the House of Representatives in their bill omitted these items, and the Bureau of Manufactures, the Bureau of Statistics, and the Bureau of Foreign Commerce in the Department of State were consolidated in one great bureau and put under the Department of Commerce and Labor, to be known as the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. The Secretary of State was before us on this matter. It is a system which I condemn, and it has been going on in all the departments by which a certain amount of money is appropriated, and the head of the department sometimes will take a clerk, for example, at $1,800 a year and increase his salary to $2,500, and take it out of the lump sum.

In the tariff act which was passed there was $100,000 authorized to be appropriated in connection with the treaty and the maximum and minimum tariff. After that legislation, which referred to the settlement of the maximum and minimum tariff, an appropriation of $100,000 was made.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not know whether I understood the Senator correctly or not. Did he say that the Secretary of State would increase the salary by paying it out of some lump sum?

Mr. OVERMAN. I say the Senator will find, as I will show in another item in the bill, that that has been done and is still done all through the departments.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is not that an illegal action?

Mr. OVERMAN. It has been done. It is the custom. I will say that there are three men here, and one was getting $1,800 provided by law, and he was paid out of the lump sum a salary of $2,700.

Mr. WARREN. He was not paid that as an additional sum, but he was taken out of one class and put in another.

Mr. OVERMAN. He was taken out of that class and given $2,700. We fix the offices here and fix certain salaries.

Mr. BRISTOW. Was he appointed to another office, or did he remain in the same office, and was his compensation increased by Executive order?

Mr. OVERMAN. He was getting $1,800, for example, in class 4. Then, under this lump sum he was given a salary of $2,700.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is, he was paid $900 out of another fund by the arbitrary action of the Secretary of State?

Mr. OVERMAN. The salary provided by law was $1,800, I understand, and he was paid $2,700 out of the lump sum.

Mr. WARREN. I think my colleague has misled the Senator from Kansas. An $1,800 man may be taken over into the lump sum and be paid $2,750, but I do not understand that he keeps the place at $1,800.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not understand that to be the case. I said that his salary was increased by the Secretary from an $1,800 job to a $2,700 job, and it had not been provided for by Congress. All these lump sums are used that way.

Mr. BRISTOW. These lump sums were given the Cabinet officer to be expended at his discretion?

Mr. OVERMAN. Let me illustrate it. One hundred thousand dollars was appropriated in connection with the settlement of the maximum and minimum tariff. Congress allowed the President to do it, but in the appropriation bill the language was a little different. I want to read it in the RECORD and to call the attention of Senators to it in connection with these offices that have not been created by Congress, but have been created by the head of the department. Although the tariff law said $100,000 should be appropriated for the settlement of the maximum and minimum tariff, in making the appropriation in the deficiency appropriation bill the following language was used:

> For defraying the necessary expenses incurred in connection with foreign trade relations within the jurisdiction of the Department of State, under tariff legislation and otherwise, and in the negotiation and preparation of treaties—> arrangements, and agreements for the advancement of commercial and other interests of the United States, and for the maintenance of a division of far eastern affairs in the Department of State, including the payment of necessary employees, at the seat of government or elsewhere, to be selected and their compensation fixed by the Secretary of State, and to be expended under his direction * * *.

That is added, you will understand, in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Now, that $100,000 was appropriated and $29,000 was used in connection with the foreign trade, but the Secretary made some offices. He made offices at $7,500 each; he made one director of the Consular Service at $4,500, and a general counsel for the Department of State, to be appointed by the President, to which we have added "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," at $7,500. He also appointed a resident diplomatic officer at $7,500, which the committee reduced to $6,500. He is to be appointed by the Secretary of State. He also, under that appropriation, appointed eight officers to aid in mere drafting work, four at $4,500 and four at $3,000. What I am objecting to is that he has made a salary for this diplomatic officer of $6,500, which is $1,500 higher than the Assistant Secretary of State himself receives.

Mr. BRISTOW. Do I understand that this $100,000, which was appropriated for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of State to administer the maximum and minimum provisions of the tariff law, has been used to create offices for apparently an entirely different object?

Mr. OVERMAN. I say in the tariff law $100,000 was authorized, and in providing for that in the appropriation bill the language was used which I read, and which is very full, as the Senator will see.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was under this authority that he made these new offices, and it looks to me——

Mr. BRISTOW. That was a temporary appropriation? It was not intended to be a permanent appropriation?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. BRISTOW. And he has created particular offices which now he proposes to saddle on Congress to provide for, regardless of our judgment as to whether they ought to be created or not?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is right.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not propose to stand for it, as far as I am concerned. I think it is outrageous.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator from Kansas that that is not a proper construction of the matter at all. If he will look at the appropriation made last year, he will see it quite differently. The difference here is that instead of appropriating $100,000 en bloc for these various matters they are itemized the same as other matters. The head of the department and his aids were before the committee to enable the committee to find where all these amounts have been paid and for what purpose and what these different officers and employees are doing. As the Senator said, we have in some cases reduced a salary, as we did the one from $7,500 to $6,500, and again we have designated, as far as we can, what each shall do. It is just in the line of what the Senator has at heart; that is, to break up the lump sum without any limit as to what the men should draw under it and insert the salary that each man draws, and it shows to what use his services are put.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I want to make an inquiry of the Senator from Wyoming. Does he not think that the Secretary of State should have come to Congress and suggested that these positions ought to have been created and then let Congress pass upon his recommendation as to whether or not these offices should have been created and to fix the compensation which the officers should receive? Has not that been the uniform practice, and is not that the way these positions should have been created?

Mr. WARREN. In the first place, the first sum was appropriated without these designations. The second time the estimate shows exactly what purpose the amount was to be put to and we appropriated accordingly. They estimated this year, and the subcommittee felt it was the time now to have spread out upon paper, mingling in with the appropriation for other officers and employees, exactly what these men were drawing and what they were to do. The committee has not increased the expense; in fact, it has lessened it. There is one less officer, and the total amount is considerably lessened.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. WARREN. In just a moment. It has been so a great many times. With lump sums they have first started on some line of action and then afterwards, when they know how to estimate, we get the estimates and try as fast as possible to elaborate and lay before Congress detailed estimates, so that Congress may know as to every item.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator from Wyoming will agree with me that this $100,000 was appropriated for a temporary purpose.

Mr. WARREN. There was nothing in the act which showed that.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will take the tariff act itself and the following appropriation bill, I ask him if it was not understood at that time by the committee and by Congress that it was a temporary appropriation to carry out the purposes of the tariff act?

Mr. WARREN. There was no such understanding a year ago in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. There was in the first appropriation, which was for that purpose and perhaps for other purposes; yet that matter was before a Senate committee that I did not serve on, and I am not as capable of answering as to that as I am as to the second one.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator knows that it had never been done before. We had the great administration here of Secretary Root——

Mr. WARREN. They were appropriated for the last year on the estimate showing just how many persons there were and the amount they each received.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the lump sum of $100,000 was appropriated last year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us understand this fully. One hundred thousand dollars was authorized under the tariff act. Then the next time they came—and the committee knew it, but nobody else—they asked for a lump sum, and it seems that out of that lump sum the Secretary of State has made some offices of $7,500 and $4,500 and $3,000. That goes to the committee. But under the bill as passed by the House of Representatives this $100,000 is expected to be carried to another department and they make an estimate. It is said that these offices are very important. I should like to have the testimony which was taken by the stenographer laid before the Senate, because I want to be fair about this matter. All these offices are newly created, and I think the officers are paid too much. I think that a resident diplomatic agent ought not to be paid more than the Assistant Secretary of State himself, who gets only $5,000. The estimate is for $7,500. We passed that through the committee for $7,500, but cut the other down to $6,500. I think that is too much money when we take into consideration what other officers of the Government are receiving. I think it is too much to pay $4,500 to a draftsman when other men here in the department are getting $3,000. There are others here doing as good work who are not getting over $2,000.

It is fair to state, however, that the Secretary of State says that some of these men speak Chinese, and they have been consulted abroad and have been used in this drafting work. Some of them speak another language.

Mr. WARREN. Many of them speak a number of languages.

Mr. OVERMAN. Some of them speak a number of languages, including English, I suppose.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I inquire if it is necessary that a draftsman should understand the Chinese language?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly, if he is drafting a treaty. This does not mean ordinary draftsmen like architects.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have not had it heretofore. I think we all agree that the administration of the Department of State under Secretary Root was a very able one, and now——

Mr. WARREN. Will my colleague on the committee let me put into the RECORD just what we did do a year ago?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; I should like to have it in the RECORD.

Mr. WARREN. This is the provision in the legislative, and so forth, appropriation act of last year:

Advancement of commercial and other interests as provided in the act approved August 5, 1909: Director of the Consular Service, $4,500; counselor for the Department of State, and resident diplomatic officer, each at $7,500, and to be appointed by the Secretary of State in accordance with the provisions of the act approved August 5, 1909; 8 officers to aid in important drafting work, 4 at $4,500 each and 4 at $3,000 each, to be appointed by the Secretary of State in accordance with the act approved August 5, 1909, and to be employed upon tariff, treaty, and trade relations and negotiations, any one of whom may be employed as chief of division of far eastern, Latin-American, near eastern, or European affairs, or upon other work in connection with foreign relations.

Mr. OVERMAN. Did that appear in the act itself?

Mr. WARREN. I am reading the law which is the current law to-day; and I go on:

Assistant solicitor, $3,000; law clerk, $2,500; 1 clerk of class 4; 3 clerks of class 3; 2 clerks of class 1; 3 clerks, at $1,000 each; 3 assistant messengers.

Then come the rooms outside the Department of State. That is all in the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is so; but the Senator will agree with me that those offices were created by the Secretary of State before that act was passed.

Mr. WARREN. Under the first law.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is all I am contending for. It is that the Secretary of State took that money and created these offices, and, having created them, then they were brought forward here in the next appropriation bill. He took a lump sum, in other words, and created these offices.

Mr. SMOOT. The lump sum was appropriated in 1909, and ever since 1909 they have been specifically appropriated for, and they were also in the current law by reason of that.

Mr. OVERMAN. How were these offices created first? Under a lump sum?

Mr. SMOOT. They were created under a lump sum. The appropriation was provided in a lump sum and for this particular purpose, and then after the appropriation of the lump sum the offices have been enumerated just as they are enumerated in the law to-day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the Senator from Utah a question. He was on the Finance Committee when the appropriation of $100,000 was authorized for the purpose of the maximum and minimum tariff in aiding the President at that time. Now, taking into consideration what was done afterwards, do I understand that that was for the purpose of creating any new offices?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course it was understood that we would create the new offices. That was what the $100,000 was appropriated for, and not only that, the law does not——

Mr. OVERMAN. Was it the Senator's understanding that it was done for a permanent or just a temporary purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. It was done for a temporary purpose, but until Congress could act, and the very next year Congress acted. It did not appropriate a lump sum, but specifically named the offices and made the direct appropriation for each one of them, and that has been done right along.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is, after the offices were created?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate committee has simply put into the law what the current law is to-day.

Mr. WARREN. No; we have put it in in a different manner. Instead of putting $100,000 at the end, we covered the different cases; it goes in as a part of the general establishment and is not divided as it was before.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all the difference there is.

Mr. WARREN. That is all.

Mr. BRISTOW. Now let me make an inquiry. Was the appropriation for the resident diplomatic officer, at $6,500, in the last appropriation bill?

Mr. CLAPP. It was $7,500 the last time.

Mr. BRISTOW. Why is he paid more than the Assistant Secretary of State?

Mr. SMOOT. Because this position is harder to fill with a qualified person than the Assistant Secretary of State.

Mr. BRISTOW. Than those of the Assistant Secretary of State?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about it in my mind. Some think that draftsman provided for simply means the ordinary draftsman, but that is not the case. That man has to draft the agreements and the treaties between the State Department and the foreign government.

Mr. OVERMAN. How many are there?

Mr. SMOOT. I will see how many there are.

Mr. WARREN. There are eight altogether.

Mr. SMOOT. There are eight—four of the first class and four of the second class.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have had those since 1909. Prior to that time the Secretary of State and the Assistant Secretary of State did it. There are eight draftsmen now.

Mr. WARREN. While Senators talk about there being eight draftsmen, the law specifically provides that they may be used to aid all these different bureaus, in the far east and in the east and in the various possessions.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, yes; they have one bureau for the far east and another for the near east.

Mr. SMOOT. Here is the current law, which says——

Mr. OVERMAN. That has been read.

Mr. SMOOT (reading):

Eight officers to aid in important drafting work, four at $4,500 each and four at $3,000 each, to be appointed by the Secretary of State in accordance with the act approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. OVERMAN. That was read by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to say just a word in regard to these different bureaus. It became impossible to do the work of the State Department properly under one head. Our relations in all directions have grown and extended naturally with the growth of our interests and with the growth of the world's business, and it became absolutely necessary to make a reorganization.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator one question with reference to the item we are discussing? Is that the matter dealt with by the Secretary of State in his letter on the subject of the Bureau of Trade Relations?

Mr. LODGE. That is a part of it.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is what I understood.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary's letter was printed as Senate Document No. 761.

Mr. LODGE. If I may continue, Mr. President, those different bureaus were originally a part of the organization and were in the scheme of reorganization made by Secretary Root. They are extremely important to the proper conduct——

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator? Is the Senator not mistaken about the reorganization? The former Secretary was before our committee. I understood that he asked for what was called an undersecretary. There was some objection to having an undersecretary, as it was following too much after Great Britain. We did not give him that, but the committee provided for this diplomatic agent, who is called counselor and whose office is very important. I am frank enough to say that I did not object to that officer. The salary was placed at $7,500, and it was stated before the committee that such an officer was needed. He is a high-priced man; he is counselor for the diplomatic service; and I had no objection to that.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to say something about that officer later, but what I was proceeding to say was with reference to the organization into divisions.

The first one was established under Secretary Root when he was Secretary of State. It was the Division of Eastern Affairs, and was first put in charge, I think, of one of the Assistant Secretaries. The officers covered by the amendment are absolutely necessary for the conduct of the affairs of the Government. The "eight officers to aid in important drafting work, four at $4,500 each and four at $3,000 each," are, under the heads of these different divisions, dealing with various phases of our foreign business.

They are of very great importance to the conduct of the business of the State Department. I have received a great many protests from business organizations, not only from my own State but from different parts of the country, against any attempt to abolish those very important offices. The State Department, Mr. President, costs less money than any other department of the Government and spends less. It has not begun to grow as the Agriculture Department has grown or as the Railway Mail Service has grown, although it has charge of our foreign relations. Its total expenditure is very modest, and a large part of it is paid by the fees in the Consular Service, which is more than can be said of the service of most departments. Certainly, nothing can be more important to our business abroad and our relations with other countries than to have a reasonable and proper force in the State Department.

What is called here by, I think, a very clumsy title, "resident diplomatic officer," was established originally with the idea of bringing back from time to time, not for long service here, some officer in the diplomatic service and utilizing him here for special work. I do not know whether or not that has drifted into the form of permanent service here.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that it has not, as we are advised. It still is the intention, if for any reason a high diplomatic officer should be desired here, to allow him to be called into service here, and then when he resumes his foreign post he goes out again better informed, because he understands what the department here is doing, and the department here understands what is being done there. When he resumes his foreign station another man may be called to take his place here, and so on.

Mr. LODGE. That was the intention in the establishment of that office, and his work has been here. The last holder of the office, who recently died, had been a minister of the United States abroad; but what seems to me of most importance is the maintenance of this division. We need very much these different bureaus for the conduct of our relations with the various countries of the world.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely desire to ask a question for information, for I have been busy in committee, and came in while this matter was being discussed. As I understand, this hundred thousand dollars was appropriated for the purpose of prosecuting the work arising out of the tariff legislation in 1909, and these offices were created to facilitate that work and other work that might accrue in the office of the Secretary of State. Since then, after these offices were created, an appropriation was made and has been continued, and these officers have been paid out of the hundred thousand dollars appropriated.

Mr. LODGE. The hundred thousand dollars was appropriated under the provisions of the tariff act of 1909, and the President was given authority under that act to employ such persons as might be required in carrying out that work. Of course, men had to be selected and the work had to be divided among them. Those persons were employed under that provision, and I suppose the President gave them a title which seemed to him appropriate for the work which he allotted to them. Then Congress provided for them by law, and has done so in two successive appropriation bills.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Since the tariff legislation has passed the officers have remained, and the appropriation is necessary?

Mr. LODGE. Some of these officers were undoubtedly covered by that appropriation.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. What duties in regard to the administration of the tariff law do these men perform or have they performed? Take the counselor for the Department of State. Is he necessary in order to administer the maximum and minimum provisions of the tariff act, and is that his duty?

Mr. LODGE. No; but he is about the most useful officer in that department.

Mr. BRISTOW. But what right has the Secretary to get an appropriation for one purpose and use it for another?

Mr. LODGE. I understand the Secretary of State has not done so. That office was created by an act of Congress.

Mr. BRISTOW. But the explanation, as I understand, is that an appropriation of a hundred thousand dollars was made to enable the Secretary of State to administer the maximum and minimum provisions of the tariff law.

Mr. LODGE. And he selected a gentleman whom he called the counselor for the department, who had charge of the negotiations under the maximum and minimum provisions which were carried on with about all the countries of the world.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is true; but that work is done now.

Mr. LODGE. That work is done.

Mr. BRISTOW. And now it is proposed to make the office a permanent position.

Mr. LODGE. It has been a permanent position for two years.

Mr. BRISTOW. Was the resident diplomatic officer also needed?

Mr. LODGE. That officer was proposed before Mr. Root went out of office.

Mr. BRISTOW. But the office was not created before that time, was it?

Mr. LODGE. No; the officer was paid from this fund, which was directly appropriated.

Mr. BRISTOW. He had nothing to do with the administration of the maximum and minimum provisions, had he?

Mr. LODGE. I understand that the office was created for that purpose.

Mr. BRISTOW. What I want to learn is, by what authority does the Secretary of State now use a fund appropriated for one purpose for another purpose entirely foreign to the purpose for which the money was appropriated?

Mr. OVERMAN. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that, although that was recommended by Secretary Root, Congress declined to do it, and, then, as I understand——

Mr. LODGE. The undersecretary was refused by Congress, but that was not recommended by Mr. Root.

Mr. OVERMAN. We did not appropriate for the diplomatic agent either until this $100,000 was appropriated. Then he was provided for out of that lump sum.

Mr. LODGE. He was paid from a lump sum.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Which was without authority of law, was it not?

Mr. LODGE and Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. BRISTOW. He had nothing to do with the administration of the maximum and minimum provisions of the tariff act.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not all that appropriation was made for. The Senator has misunderstood the provision of the law. If the Senator will take the tariff act of 1909, and refer to section 2 of that act, he will find the requirements under that act, which imposed upon the President of the United States duties regarding our relations with foreign countries not only as to the maximum and minimum provisions, but as to the laws relating to the enforcement of tariff legislation, and so forth. Then there occurs this provision:

> To secure information to assist the President in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this section, and the officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws, the President is hereby authorized to employ such persons as may be required.

That is what the appropriation of the lump sum of $100,000 was made for.

Mr. BRISTOW. It may be perfectly plain and clear to the Senator from Utah, but to my mind it is a flagrant misappropriation of the public money. I can not put any other construction upon it. This money was not appropriated for the purpose for which it has been expended.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not nearly so much interested in the original appropriation as I am in discovering whether the Government at this time needs these officers and whether the compensation provided here is a fair compensation. I am sure that the Senator from Massachusetts will say that under an appropriation such as was made in 1909 there would be no authority to create these offices. The work was done by three members of a Tariff Board concerning which we have——

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, I am sure a large part of it was.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I know he is mistaken.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know the Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken.

Mr. LODGE. Wait one moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. A large part of the work of applying the maximum and minimum provisions of the tariff act was done by the members of the Tariff Board.

Mr. LODGE. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me one moment——

Mr. CUMMINS. I may be wrong; and if the Senator from Massachusetts can convince me, it is all right.

Mr. LODGE. Not only was it not in the hands of the Tariff Board, but the State Department would not employ the Tariff Board on it, and refused to admit them to participation in the work. It was only by direction of the President that they were consulted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts, then, say by what authority the President appointed these men?

Mr. LODGE. Under the direct authority that he was given to employ such persons as were required for this work. This appropriation has nothing to do with the Tariff Board.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Massachusetts is rapidly getting into contact with the Tariff Board.

Mr. LODGE. No. Mr. President, this relates to foreign trade relations. The Tariff Board has nothing to do with foreign trade relations. The Tariff Board was created by Congress to investigate the question of labor cost. The Bureau of Trade Relations was created in order to make our treaty arrangements conform to the maximum and minimum provisions.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, if the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, the Tariff Board was appointed when there was not a word of authority with respect to ascertaining the difference in the labor cost here and abroad. It was appointed solely to apply the maximum and minimum provisions of the tariff law of 1909, and it was appointed under the language quoted by the Senator from Utah, and which I beg to quote again:

To secure information to assist the President in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this section—

That is the maximum and minimum section—

and the officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws, the President is hereby authorized to employ such persons as may be required.

And he employed Prof. Emery, Mr. Reynolds, and Mr. Sanders to do that work under the act of 1909. I know very well that the State Department assisted them in the work; they had to do so; but the Senator from Massachusetts can hardly maintain the proposition that the Tariff Board, or what is called the Tariff Board now, was not appointed under the $100,000 appropriation of which he has spoken. There was no appropriation for the so-called Tariff Board in 1909. I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts to know if that be not true?

Mr. LODGE. The Tariff Board was undoubtedly paid from that appropriation the first year, but after that there was a separate appropriation. I am speaking now, Mr. President, of the conduct of negotiations in regard to the maximum and minimum provisions, with which I think I am fairly familiar. I know that that work was taken in hand by the State Department; and, greatly to my regret, it was with the utmost difficulty that they could get the State Department to consult the Tariff Board at all, and it was finally consulted only upon the order of the President. The State Department wished to have complete control of that matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, the State Department has no jurisdiction whatever over it.

Mr. LODGE. There I beg to differ from the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was given by this act to such persons as the President might employ for that purpose. I have been advised by one of the members of the board that he visited Canada and entered into negotiations with the Dominion of Canada in order to smooth away some of the difficulties that had arisen with Canada respecting the application of the maximum and minimum features of our law; and I am sure that he spent a very considerable time there in order to avoid a conflict which seemed likely to arise. I believe that one of the members of this board also visited Europe for a similar purpose, although I am not so well advised with regard to that. But I did not really rise to ask that question of the Senator from Massachusetts. I know that all these matters were provided for the year afterwards, and that these officers were estimated and appropriated for. If there ever was a mistake made, we have probably condoned it, and I do not care whether the Secretary of State had authority to do these things or not, so far as the present discussion is concerned. In creating a bureau in the State Department I assume that all these men are necessary. I have no reason to doubt that they are; I know nothing about it, and I accept the judgment of the committee with respect to their work and the necessity for their work; but I do not like the practice in an appropriation bill of attempting to describe the character of the work which they are to perform with such particularity as is contained in this bill. For instance, the amendment reads:

Eight officers to aid in important drafting work—

They are not officers in any sense of the word; I do not know whether their compensation is too much or too little.

Four, at $3,000 each, to be appointed by the Secretary of State——

Mr. LODGE. "And to be employed"——

Mr. CUMMINS. That is what I object to—and to be employed upon tariff, treaty, and trade relations and negotiations, any one of whom may be employed as chief of division of far eastern, Latin American, near eastern, or European affairs, or upon other work in connection with foreign relations.

We have given the Secretary of State certain power and we have imposed upon him certain duties. Whatever the Secretary of State has a right to do under the law respecting the tariff, respecting treaties, respecting trade relations and negotiations, I am willing that he shall do, and I am willing that he shall be equipped with an ample force to enable him to do his work, but I do not want to see an appropriation bill passed, if I can help it, that confers upon him authority that he does not now possess. I do not know whether this bill does so, but I am unwilling to venture upon that field, and so later on——

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am interrupting the Senator from Massachusetts, I believe.

Mr. WARREN. I will then ask the Senator from Massachusetts to yield to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. We might as well keep in view what the Senator stated in the opening of his remarks. The question is whether or not the Secretary of State needs these officers and employees. The Secretary of State and the assistant secretaries were before our committee, and they made it very plain, at least they made it plain to me and I think to others of the committee, that they did need these officers. We did not have any idea of their meddling with the customs tariff as such, but the provision here, "and to be employed upon tariff, treaty, and trade relations and negotiations," refers to agreements between countries which necessarily must have some connection with the tariff.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the necessity of describing what these men shall do?

Mr. WARREN. There may be none, but that provision has been in the law; and if it is an error, it can be corrected by striking out the superfluous language.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was not in the law until very recenlty.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes; it was authorized in an appropriation act.

Mr. CUMMINS. Last year.

Mr. WARREN. Going back a little, there has been a great deal said about a hundred thousand dollar appropriation. The original appropriation was $75,000, and whatever authorization then was granted the addition carried in the next act included more matters upon which these employees should be engaged and provided more money. Then followed various appropriation acts in which was stated specifically the manner in which they should be employed. The language may be distasteful to the Senator, but if he thinks that they are employed on the ordinary work of the tariff, as the Finance Committee is, he should dismiss that idea from his mind.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want the Secretary of State to do whatever he may lawfully do with respect to the tariff, and I do not want to extend his authority through an appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. If I may add merely another word, as the Senator will see, the amendment also provides:

For meeting occasional and unforeseen expenses arising in connection with foreign trade relations which come within the jurisdiction of the Department of State under tariff legislation and otherwise, and in the negotiation and preparation of treaties, arrangements, and agreements for the advancement of commercial and other interests, including the appointment of necessary employees at the seat of government or otherwise, to be selected and compensated under the provisions of the said act of August 5, 1909, $25,340.

The $25,340, of course, comes out of the $100,000 appropriation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have the same objection to that, and at the proper time I intend to move to strike some of it out. I do not intend to interfere with these men or with their salaries, for I do not know whether they are needed or not; but I do know that, under the act of 1909, the Secretary of State has no duties to perform. I know that the President was authorized or directed to employ certain persons to do certain work under that act; but he does not employ the Secretary of State for that purpose—that is not a very good term to describe the relations of the President to the Secretary of State. The President was authorized directly in the act of 1909 to do the work contemplated by that act, and I do not want to confuse the work of the Tariff Board and the office of the Secretary of State; and I hope the Senator from Massachusetts, who is very familiar with our foreign relations, and the Senator from Wyoming, who is interested, I suppose, only in maintaining the department in full vigor, will consider the question of whether we ought to attempt to define duties or enlarge powers in an appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in reply, first, to what the Senator said last, of course the $100,000 covered the matter of the maximum and minimum provisions of the tariff act, but they involved our trade relations with every country with which we have treaties of commerce and friendship. Of course, there was but one person through whom those negotiations could be conducted, and that person was the Secretary of State. Necessarily, anything of that sort, involving the modification of treaties, would have to be carried on through the Secretary of State.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I remind the Senator from Massachusetts of the fact that the act of 1909 had nothing to do with the treaties? It authorized nobody to make a treaty nor to invite a treaty; it simply provided a certain penalty for discrimination.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, perhaps I had better explain all that in detail, as I understand it. The maximum and minimum provisions fixed certain rates at which imports should come into this country, dependent on the rates accorded or the treatment of certain of our products by foreign countries. If foreign countries did not make a satisfactory arrangement with us on those points, then one set of duties went into effect; if they did make those arrangements with us, then the other set of duties went into effect. It was absolutely impossible to come to any conclusion as to whether the maximum or minimum tariff was to go into effect, except by ascertaining what the foreign country was ready to do, and we can communicate with foreign countries to find out what they are ready to do on the tariff or any other subject only through the established organ, which is the State Department.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I see that the paragraph which concludes on page 36 provides for an increased appropriation of $93,000.

Mr. LODGE. That was the exact amount by which the appropriations of last year were reduced.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The House put in nothing for the purposes covered by the Senate amendment?

Mr. LODGE. The House cut off what was appropriated last year for these purposes.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. For the special officers enumerated here?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. They were all enumerated in the law last year.

Coming to the other question of which the Senator first spoke, and which I agree with him is the essential question in this matter, I approach this subject entirely from the point of view of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I am not on the Committee on Appropriations; I never have served upon it, and I know nothing about it from that standpoint; but I can speak from personal knowledge of the work done by the officers named here. I know of my own knowledge that the Director of the Consular Service and the counselor for the Department of State are exceedingly necessary. There is no one who does more work or more important work than the counselor for the Department of State, who, according to the provision, is to be appointed by the President.

In regard to the resident diplomatic officer I do not profess to be able to explain. I suppose the committee understands what his work is and all that; I frankly say I do not know.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I help the Senator from Massachusetts a little on that point?

Mr. LODGE. I know the intention, but I do not know the exact work he does.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. Dawson, who died two weeks ago, was the resident diplomatic officer. I happen to have known him from his childhood. He entered the Diplomatic Service something like 18 years ago, and became most familiar with all our relations with the South American and Central American States.

Mr. LODGE. He was a very valuable man.

Mr. CUMMINS. He became an expert on all these subjects, and was employed by the State Department to take up all matters that might arise between our country and especially the Central American and South American Republics, to negotiate upon them, and to preserve the good relations which we hope always to preserve between those countries and the United States. He was a very faithful, a very efficient, and I think a most successful officer, and I believe he earned all the salary the country ever paid him.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator will surely understand that in what I was saying I did not refer to Mr. Dawson. I know what an admirable man he was, how highly trained he was, and what fine work he was capable of doing, and did. I had the pleasure of knowing him myself. My point is this: We have a division of Latin-American affairs. At the head of that division there ought to be a man as nearly as possible of the character I have described. What the resident diplomatic officer does as an officer is what I do not understand. I know what Mr. Dawson did and what he did very well; but it is work that it seems to me ought to come under the division of Latin-American affairs.

Those divisions have been of the greatest possible use. It was impossible to conduct our relations without some reorganization of a division of that sort. To have them all jumbled up in the hands of one man who could not possibly carry them on had become intolerable. The Bureau of Trade Relations has been of the greatest possible value to our business interests. It is in regard to that that I have heard from business associations all over the country, and it would be a real misfortune to have that Bureau of Trade Relations crippled in any way.

I do not believe myself that it belongs to the Department of Commerce and Labor. I do not think you can mix up the business of our foreign relations with domestic matters. It is perfectly easy to have them furnish all that is necessary for the Bureau of Statistics, but I do believe that in our foreign-trade relations nothing could be better or more important than the work these officers are doing. I am speaking without any personal feeling, but merely in regard to the performance of the public duties and the doing of the public work, and to do that I am certain that they are all needed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in rising I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this paragraph, in connection with the matter the Senator was last talking about. Incidentally I referred to heads of departments appointing men from lump sums. I believe it ought to be condemned. It ought not to be allowed. I not only speak of this department as we go along, but I am going to show what is done in some other departments.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, he did not understand me as defending the lump-sum system?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. I do not. I think it is a bad system.

Mr. OVERMAN. I only stated that in passing. I said I did not disagree as to some of the salaries; but I want to inform the Senate that these bureaus in the State Department and in other departments have been by the House of Representatives consolidated into one great department. Secretary Nagel comes here and agrees, and it seems to me that everybody else except the Secretary of State has agreed, that the thing to do is to put them in the Department of Commerce and Labor and to consolidate them in one great department. It would save a great amount of money for the Government, instead of duplicating the work, by having one department here and another there. For example, on examining the Secretary of State, he said to me, "Senator OVERMAN, I have shown your people how to bale cotton. I have sent photographs down in your country showing how to do it." I said, "Mr. Secretary, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and the Department of Commerce and Labor have done the same thing; they have sent photographs down there and taught our people how to bale cotton, and have sent their agents down there, and that has been of great value to us; but why duplicate it, why have your department doing one thing and the Department of Commerce and Labor doing the same thing?" That is what I complain of, and that is the reason why the House of Representatives consolidated the work in one great department.

Mr. WARREN. I simply wanted to put in the RECORD the fact that having in view the abuse of lump sums, I think it would be very hard, even in a tariff bill from another committee, to have provided a lump sum which was supposed to continue, for the language of the original law reads:

And a detailed statement of all expenditures under this provision shall be made to Congress at its next session.

The intention being, of course, to take it up specifically.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 6, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 5, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, draw us by Thy holy influence close to Thee, and make us conscious of Thy presence, that with clear perceptions, high ideals, and noble endeavors we may do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with our God, and thus satisfy the longings of our own hearts and reflect glory upon the God of our salvation. In Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 18985) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. SHIVELY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3815) to amend an act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean steamers," approved June 24, 1910, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. BURTON, and Mr. NEWLANDS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to joint resolution (S. J. Res. 97) authorizing the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography to occupy temporary structures erected by the American Red Cross and to erect temporary structures in Potomac Park, Washington, D. C.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions (S. Res. 328):

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. ELBERT H. HUBBARD, late a Representative from the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That a committee of eight Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join a committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

In compliance with the foregoing, the Vice President had appointed as said committee Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. KENYON, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. BORAH, Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. GRONNA, and Mr. HITCHCOCK.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13041) to provide for the support and maintenance of bastards in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 6848. An act authorizing the Cooper River Corporation, organized under the laws of the State of South Carolina, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Goose Creek, in Berkeley County, S. C.; and

S. 5910. An act granting to the city of Portland, Oreg., certain strips of land from the post-office and customhouse sites in said city for street purposes.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 5428. An act to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," approved February 19, 1909; and

S. J. Res. 97. Joint resolution authorizing the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography to occupy temporary structures erected by the American Red Cross, and to erect temporary structures in Potomac Park, Washington, D. C.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BARTHOLDT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for two weeks, on account of important business.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9061) known as the eight-hour bill, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill which the Clerk will report, and to concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

An act (H. R. 9061) limiting the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States or for any Territory or for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the amendments reported, or a very brief statement made as to them.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania particularly, first, in reference to the amendment which affects the purchase of those goods which can be bought in the open market, whether made to conform to specifications or not? There was a change. I noted it when it went through the Senate, but I could not quite catch the point.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the only change that there is in the Senate amendment is a transposition in the language. It is transferred from one portion of the bill to another portion of the bill, and does not materially affect it. It is the same language.

Mr. MANN. That is the point. I am not certain whether it materially affects it or not. When you take language out of one place in a bill and insert it in another place for the purpose, as expressed, of making a change, I think we ought to know what the change is that is effected.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Here is the language as it now reads:

That nothing in this act shall apply to contracts for transportation by land or water, or for the transmission of intelligence, or—

And this is where the transposition takes place—for the purchase of supplies by the Government, whether manufactured to conform to particular specifications or not, or for materials—

And then it goes on to use the same language.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman just read the language where the Senate inserted it, or as it was in the House bill?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Where the Senate inserted it. As it was when it passed the House it was in the bill further on. At that point the language of the bill, eliminating the supplies part of it, is—or for such materials or articles as may usually be bought in the open market, except armor and armor plate, whether made to conform to particular specifications or not.

And it seems to me that it makes it more clear and specific, and does not leave the possibility of the qualification applying only to armor plate.

Mr. MANN. Then, in the gentleman's opinion, with the Senate amendment it is perfectly plain that the law does not apply to goods which can ordinarily be purchased in the open market, whether they are made to conform to specifications or not?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It does not.

Mr. MANN. I understand this excepts the Panama Canal until 1915, and special work on the Mississippi River.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. This excepts the Panama Canal or contracts on the Panama Canal until 1915, and excepts levees and revetments on the river work. In addition to that it does not change the provisions contained in the appropriation acts of 1906, where it was provided that the eight-hour act should not apply to alien employees on the Panama Canal, and it changes the date upon which the act shall go into effect to January 1 next, the presumption being that that is for the purpose of allowing those who are making bids to have an opportunity to make their establishments conform to the changed conditions.

Mr. MANN. One other question: I think this eight-hour bill was inserted as an amendment to the naval appropriation bill the other day.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I suppose if these Senate amendments are agreed to, and this bill becomes a law, it is not the intention to have that amendment remain in the naval bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. As far as I am concerned, I can see only one use that that amendment would have on the naval bill, and that would be to take care of the interim between the time when this bill goes into effect and the time of the passage of the appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. I know, but if you agree to the Senate amendments to this bill, then the two are not the same. That is what I am speaking of. It would not do to enact this law in this shape with the Senate amendments in it, and then enact the naval bill as it passed the House. If that becomes a law later, it will create confusion.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If that is incorporated in the naval bill when it comes back here, it seems to me it ought to be changed to conform to this bill.

Mr. MANN. But we would not have the power to do that. We have no further control over a provision after it has been sent to the Senate, unless it is amended by the Senate.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It seems to me when the bill comes from the Senate, if it still contains the eight-hour amendment, that amendment ought to be made to conform to this provision.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman probably would have some control over what might be done in the Senate to that amendment. But if the amendment which was inserted in the House should be agreed to in the Senate, in its present language, the House would have no further control over it. We could not change it, and somebody ought to see that that is made to conform to the amendments agreed to here.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. As I understand, there is not very much danger of that being the situation.

Mr. MANN. I do not know. When you attempt to duplicate the same thing in two bills, you ought to be careful that they do not conflict.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Does the gentleman think there is anything in these amendments that we are trying to agree to now that would conflict with the character of work that the eight-hour bill applies to on the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. MANN. I was not here when that was agreed to, but I understood that the bill which passed the House was offered as an amendment to the naval bill. Is not that the case?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is the case.

Mr. MANN. So if we agreed to these changes proposed by the Senate to this bill, we ought not to insert the House bill into another law in the form in which it passed the House, without the Senate amendments, because that would get us into confusion.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I understand what the gentleman is after. Of course we all want to accomplish the same result.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with the business in order to-day under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to dispense with Calendar Wednesday for this day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is the 5th day of June, and that the sundry civil bill (H. R. 25069), which is now before the House, contains 176 pages. I understood from the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] yesterday that there were a number of items in the bill which he expected would be debated at considerable length, and to which amendments will be offered during the consideration. This bill should be sent to the Senate with as little delay as possible, in order to give the Senate committee an opportunity to consider the various matters connected with it, and to give the Senate itself some time to consider those matters before the end of the fiscal year. It has always taken considerable time to pass the bill in the House, and in view of the fact that we are now approaching what many Members hope are the remaining few weeks of the session, we are at least within the spirit of the rule which provides that during the last two weeks of the session Wednesday shall not be set aside specially for the business of Calendar Wednesday. It seems to me wise to ask the House at this time to permit consideration of the sundry civil bill and to proceed with the general debate thereon.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire, if Calendar Wednesday should be dispensed with to-day, if the business in order to-day would come up on the next Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. It would. The bill that the gentleman has charge of would be considered as the unfinished business.

Mr. FOSTER. I am quite anxious to get this bill disposed of, and yet I realize that there is a great deal of business in the House that needs to be attended to if we are to adjourn anywhere within the next three weeks, and I shall not oppose the motion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, while Calendar Wednesday under the rules has not been entirely satisfactory, and while I think it would be possible to make a rule which would be satisfactory, I see no occasion at this time for dispensing with the rule. So far as the House is concerned, it would be quite competent for Congress to adjourn in 10 days, as far as the appropriation bills are concerned. I have seen the time in the House when the sundry civil appropriation bill was passed within two or three days, and the same can be done again by holding evening or night sessions, if there be any occasion for it; and if it would do any good, Members of the House would be quite willing to sit here at night if thereby we could get away from Washington by the middle of the month.

But up to date I have seen no great likelihood of an adjournment by the middle of the month. If it appears at the other end of the Capitol that we can get away at that time, we can dispose of our business here easy enough. I do not believe that we ought to set the precedent of dispensing with Calendar Wednesday. Under the rule which provides for Calendar Wednesday, while it is quite possible to call the Calendar of Committees on other days of the week, we all know that it has not been practicable to do so for a long time.

Gentlemen now seem to assume that they can pass important bills by placing them on the Unanimous Consent Calendar without consideration, and the gentleman from New York, if he dispenses with Calendar Wednesday to-day, will only add to that desire. We can dispose of the sundry civil appropriation bill in ample time, and meanwhile, if the gentleman believes that this is the last two weeks of the session, let him bring in a resolution for a final adjournment of Congress in two weeks and pass it through the House; and when they have done that they have a license, perhaps, to ask that Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with. But until that is done I do not think they have.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Permit me to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I do not believe that this side of the House proposes to bring in any resolution for adjournment until the differences between the two Houses on the appropriation bills are settled. If the gentlemen on that side imagine that by delaying consideration of this bill, or in any other way, they are going to make the House abandon the great reforms that they have sent to the Senate, they will find that they are mistaken.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not yield to the gentleman for a political speech; that is all buncombe.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not all buncombe, and the gentleman from Illinois will find it out.

Mr. MANN. That would have nothing to do with the adjustment of the matters in dispute between the House and the Senate. If the gentleman had brought in the sundry civil appropriation bill at the time it ought to have been brought in, a month ago, it would not be necessary now to ask for this suspension.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. On which side of this question is the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CANNON. I think on both. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The reason that the Chair asked the question is that the rule provides for only five minutes' debate on a side. The gentleman from Illinois has used up the five minutes on his side, and the gentleman from New York has used three minutes, leaving two minutes remaining. If the gentleman from Illinois is on both sides of the question, the Chair will hear him for two minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am quite in harmony with proceeding as rapidly as possible with the consideration of this bill. I suppose the motion would have been subject to a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; it is in order under the rule.

Mr. CANNON. The rule for Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; it takes a two-thirds vote. I had forgotten for the moment. Now, a little bit on the other side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois has not said very much on this side. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. A little bit on the other side. It should not be forgotten that this day is the day that by a vote of the House was specially dedicated to business that no constitutional question can interrupt, and yet I suppose two-thirds might dispense with it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there is on this side of the House an application for only one-half hour more of general debate on the sundry civil bill. I have been informed that several gentlemen on the other side desire to occupy more or less time. I desire to accommodate them, and I hoped we might be able to do so by utilizing to-day. If the gentleman does not care to occupy very much more time in general debate, then we can proceed to-morrow and not have very much time for general debate to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to dispense with Calendar Wednesday.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 72, noes 52.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion to dispense with Calendar Wednesday.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 96, nays 146, answered "present" 13, not voting 136, as follows:

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MCKINLEY, voted?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye," and I wish to withdraw my vote and vote "present."

The name of Mr. BARNHART was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and desire to withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. MANN was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

BUREAU OF MINES.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The unfinished business is the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17260, and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17260, with Mr. MARTIN of Colorado in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17260) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish in the Department of the Interior a Bureau of Mines," approved May 16, 1910.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, in section 3, on line 2, there appears the words "and distribute." I think that it is proper, under the amendment passed in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill providing that these publications should be sent out from the Government Printing Office, that those words should be eliminated from the bill.

Mr. MANN. I did not hear what the gentleman stated.

Mr. FOSTER. This is at the top of the page, line 3, in reference to the words "and distribute."

Mr. MANN. What is the proposition?

Mr. FOSTER. What I want to get at is, if the provision of the legislative bill providing for the distribution of these publications at the Government Printing Office instead of from the different departments is passed, to conform with it I think these words ought to be eliminated.

Mr. MANN. The words "and distribute"?

Mr. AUSTIN. Why not let them remain, and if the House amendment prevails the Senate can strike them out of this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I judge that is a provision of law that would be proper to apply to this.

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is any doubt section 2, which provides they shall disseminate information concerning certain things, gives them authority to distribute regardless of whether this is stricken out or not.

Mr. FOSTER. The provision in the legislative bill, if it becomes a law, will apply to all the departments of the Government.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but I do not think you will lose anything by striking out the words.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think so, and that is the reason I think this ought to come out.

Mr. MANN. You would have to strike out the words "and distribute" and insert the word "and" before the word "publish."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the words "and distribute," page 3, line 2, be stricken from the bill and the word "and" inserted before the word "publish."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 1, page 3, by adding, after the word "prepare," the word "and"; and, page 3, line 1, strike out the words "and distribute."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. The amendment to which the gentleman refers in a bill which the House has already passed has not yet become a law. Suppose the Senate should strike out that from the bill and the conferees should see fit to agree to that, and the House should adopt the report of the conferees, then the Bureau of Mines would be unable to get out that information.

Mr. MANN. Under section 2 they have authority now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Every department of the Government is doing this same work, and there is no such language.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask in regard to the punctuation of section 3. I notice, for instance, in line 10, after the word "industries," there is a semicolon. In most places where they separate the different classes a comma is used. I do not care particularly about it, but it says, "The use of explosives and electricity"—that is a clause by itself—"safety methods and appliances," and "rescue and first-aid work in said industries." I rather think they ought to use a semicolon after the word "electricity," but I do not know it is important.

Mr. FOSTER. I believe it is all right as it is.

Mr. MANN. It is not well punctuated; there is no doubt about that. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the Bureau of Mines or any employee of said bureau to undertake any investigation or operation in behalf of any private party, except, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the health and safety of persons employed in the mining, quarrying, metallurgical, or other mining industries; nor shall the director or any member of said bureau have any personal or private interest in any mine or the products of any mine under investigation: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as preventing the employment by the Bureau of Mines, in a consulting capacity or in the temporary investigation of special subjects, of any engineer or other expert whose principal professional practice is outside of such employment by said bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 20, by striking out the word "mining" and inserting the word "mineral."

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman what is the object of that amendment?

Mr. FOSTER. That applies to it more particularly, and I think it is a better word to use.

Mr. MANN. "Mining industry" is a common expression and "mineral industry" is an unusual expression.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, it is thought that covers the field better than the words "mining industries."

Mr. MANN. But we use everywhere in the census, in statistical work everywhere, the term "mining industries"; we do not use the term anywhere "mineral industry."

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. What do they mine except minerals?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; over on section 2.

Mr. MANN. I do not mean they do not use it in this bill.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield? I think when that matter was up for consideration before the committee the suggestion was that it would cover quarrying as well as mining.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 17 and 18, strike out the words: "With the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

On page 3, line 20, after the word "industries," insert the words: "And with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that that be reported again.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman willing to have the amendment divided so that it can be voted upon separately?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment, in lines 17 and 18, to strike out the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. FOSTER. I will state, Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted, it would read:

Except for the health and safety of persons employed in mining, quarrying, metallurgical, or other mineral industries, and with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

It was thought that the changing of this language, striking it out above there, and inserting it below, makes it better sense than to leave it as it is now.

Mr. MANN. I think likely it changes the meaning.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not intentionally do it.

Mr. MANN. But the point is whether, after all, we shall permit the Bureau of Mines to engage in this private work. The provision "except with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior" inserted in either place permits the work to be performed in private mines.

Mr. FOSTER. It only provides for conditions of health and safety.

Mr. MANN. It provides for the health and safety of persons employed in all of these industries.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. That permits anything to be done.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no. It says "except for the health and safety"——

Mr. FITZGERALD. What does the gentleman think is intended to be done under this provision?

Mr. FOSTER. I say this prohibits the Bureau of Mines or any employee thereof from going into any private property, except where it may be thought necessary, and be permitted by the mine owner, for improving the conditions of health.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The truth of the matter is, this is not intended to prohibit at all. This is intended to authorize, although it is put in a very awkward way.

Mr. FOSTER. No; it is not. It simply says they shall not go on any private property except for that purpose. It limits them to that purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no authority now to permit.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman ought to be willing to strike the whole provision out, so that there will be no restriction to their going there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have no authority to go there now.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this is to meet the argument that this bureau is going on private property to do all sorts of work. This limits them to the going onto private property, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to improve health conditions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not strike the whole provision out?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is better to have it in here so as to show the limitation.

Mr. MANN. I think my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is correct.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know what I am speaking about. I know what the purpose of this provision is, even if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] does not.

Mr. FOWLER. It is a limitation.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that I have great respect for his opinion on most matters, but I think in this case he is mistaken as to the idea of what it means. I do not think it goes beyond what it says.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know very well what is meant by this provision——

Mr. FOSTER. I think I do, too.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). And the purpose of it. And the reason and the purpose of why it is put in here is to enable the Bureau of Mines, at the instance of private individuals, to make a special examination of a particular mine for the latter's benefit.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, the gentleman is wrong.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not, because I had it from the lips of the head of the Bureau of Mines himself when I had occasion to investigate the operations of the bureau on other occasions.

Mr. FOSTER. The intention is to go into general conditions, into matters, for instance, with reference to eliminating coal dust and eliminating gases to better secure the safety of miners. Now, it might be necessary to go into a private mine and look up those conditions. The same condition might exist in stone quarries in reference to doing away with the dust that exists there, and also in metal mining.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] a question. Would his objection be removed if the words "in behalf of" were stricken out and there was inserted in their place the word "respecting," so that it would read "any investigation or operation respecting private property"?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the way this provision reads.

Mr. MILLER. It would reach the exact situation that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] describes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The first two sections of the bill describe the authority of the Bureau of Mines. The third section provides for the preparation and publication of reports. Now, the fourth section provides—

That nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the Bureau of Mines or any employee of said bureau to undertake any investigation or operation in behalf of any private party, except with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

If anybody can find in the preceding sections anything from which such authority might be inferred, I would be glad to have it pointed out. But this section, under the guise of limiting some power apparently conferred on the bureau, proceeds to recite "any investigation" for certain purposes, "except with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior," the purpose being to enlarge the powers given here, so that this bureau may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, go upon these private properties and make investigations that should be made by the owners of the mines themselves.

Mr. MILLER. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in section 2 the bureau is authorized to conduct inquiries and scientific and technologic investigations concerning mining. Now, that in itself is quite a broad authorization.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is very comprehensive.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That might authorize and would authorize the investigation of methods of utilizing materials in mining. In order that that may not be used for the purpose of determining the methods of utilizing that waste for the benefit of individuals this clause is inserted in section 4, that such operations as are embodied in that authorization shall not be used for the benefit or in behalf of owners of private property. And then, when you make that inhibition and prevent them from using that in making such tests in behalf of private individuals, the question naturally arises as to whether such tests should not be made for the purpose of promoting the health and safety of employees in mines, and so this clause has been inserted for the purpose of qualifying the qualification.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] what he thinks of this situation: These items restrict any investigation to our health and safety conditions. Suppose there is a State where there are no mining laws—there are States, I believe, that have no mining laws. Illinois has a mining law, and Pennsylvania has some law for protecting miners. Assuming, however, that the State of Indiana, for instance, has not such a mining law, and there is a condition in a coal mine in that State that the workmen feel is entirely unsafe and unhealthy. Now, a mining corporation is under no requirement of law to make changes, but if there should be an investigation, not for the benefit of the mining company, but for the benefit of the miners themselves—an investigation by the Government—and a report to show to the world that the mining conditions there were not healthy and safe, would not that be a wise and good thing to do?

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman is entirely right about that.

Mr. MILLER. Is not that what this section is designed to reach?

Mr. FOSTER. In some mines there is a great deal of coal dust which is known to have given rise to explosions. Now it is a problem how the dust of these mines may be eliminated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has expired for the consideration of this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, only one Member has been recognized on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Four or five Members have spoken.

Mr. MANN. That may be, but there has been no recognition by the Chair. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague, be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the time of his colleague [Mr. FOSTER] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. The matter of getting rid of this dust so as to prevent explosions has been a problem that the Mining Bureau has been investigating. One method that they have been experimenting with is by using the exhaust steam that comes from the engine so as to moisten the mine. There have been experiments all along these lines for the safety of the miners. Now under this provision of the bill it limits them to these questions of safety and health conditions.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Under section 2 the bureau is given authority to study the subject of health conditions, waste, and almost everything else that relates to mining. Under section 4 it provides that you can not study health conditions in the mines without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Does that mean in each particular case?

Mr. FOSTER. I think wherever the employees of the Bureau of Mines go into a private mine to study health conditions there, that before that can be done they must get the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. But suppose they have an explosion in a mine and people are imprisoned and the Mining Bureau wants to go there and study health conditions while the conditions are in such a state as to make it desirable that they should be studied. Do I understand that they have to come and get hold of the Secretary of the Interior, procure his approval, before they can study the health conditions of that mine?

Mr. FOSTER. I think the Secretary of the Interior would issue a general order that in case of accident they could go and visit the mine.

Mr. MANN. I asked the gentleman a little while ago whether it would require the approval in a particular case, or whether he would give a blanket order——

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, I did not understand the gentleman's question, I thought he meant generally, without any extraordinary case.

Mr. MANN. But the extraordinary cases would not make any difference; if he can write a blanket order there is no necessity of putting that provision in the bill. That is the first thing the Secretary of the Interior does—is to write a blanket order.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman what he means by a "private mine."

Mr. FOSTER. A mine that the Government has nothing to do with.

Mr. GARNER. How many mines does the Government own?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government owns no mines except an experimental mine at Pittsburgh.

Mr. BOWMAN. If the gentleman will pardon me, is not this the situation: That there would be no question that if there was an explosion or a serious accident in a mine it would be the duty of the Government and the duty of the State government to go at once?

Mr. MANN. Where does the gentleman get that authority? He says it is the duty of the Government.

Mr. BOWMAN. In section 2. It is necessary in a case of accident that they should go to the mine and find out what new conditions have arisen.

Mr. MANN. Does my colleague agree to that?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I do not think they have the authority to go into a private mine even if there has been an accident.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Not without the consent of the owner of the mine.

Mr. FOSTER. Not without the consent of the owner of the mine.

Mr. BOWMAN. It would not be in behalf of the private person or the owner of the mine in case of an accident in which the lives of many men might be in question; that would not be in behalf of the private person or the private mine owner.

Mr. FOSTER. I think if an accident occurred in a mine owned by private persons that the employees of the Bureau of Mines would not have authority to go in if permission was refused by the mine owner. I think the Government has no right to go in there against the refusal of the mine owner.

Mr. MANN. Under section 2 it is contemplated, I take it, that the Bureau of Mines may go into a private mine and make studies not only of health conditions, but of all other mining conditions.

Mr. FOSTER. To a limited degree.

Mr. MANN. Not to a limited degree, except that the owner of the mine can keep them out; the authority, as far as we are concerned, is complete.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If you can not go into private mines to study health and other conditions, and there are no public mines in this country, what is the object of this commission?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think you can go in.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; you can not.

Mr. MANN. Under section 2, as I understand it, it is the purpose to give to this mining bureau the authority, so far as we are concerned—that is, the authority of the expenditure of money—to go into a mine anywhere to study conditions. Of course, you may have to get the consent of the private owner.

Mr. FOSTER. You will always have to do that.

Mr. MANN. That is another question. If section 2 gives the authority to go into the mines to study health conditions or other mining conditions, why should we provide in section 4 that as to health conditions, which are the most important, they can not go in without obtaining the consent of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. In this next section, 4, it says in behalf of the owner and in the other section it is for the general welfare. That is the distinction.

Mr. MANN. I know, but there is no difference at all. The Government pays the expense. They go in to study the health conditions. It is necessarily in behalf of the owner and public both in every case. There is no authority except to study conditions and make report. If the purpose of section 4 is that this should be done at the expense of the private owner, it ought to say so.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly. There is no excuse for section 4 except to permit the Government to go and make a study of conditions for the special benefit of the private owner, and if it is to be for the special benefit of the private owner, he ought to pay the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Is not section 2 broad enough to give that authority and is not this a limitation?

Mr. MANN. I think section 2 allows them to go anywhere.

Mr. FOWLER. I think so, and is not this a limitation?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question, to further carry out his idea in respect to the private ownership of mines. I believe the gentleman has stated that this bill would not permit this commission to go into privately owned mines without the consent of the owner of the mine?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly not.

Mr. CARTER. We have in Oklahoma an application of the conservation theory. That is, we have mines there which are owned by the Indians but worked on a lease basis, with a royalty pay to the Government for the Indians of 8 cents per ton. What I want to ask the gentleman is this: What would be the effect of his bill on those mines? Would it permit this commission to go into those mines without the permission of the owners of the property? Would the commission have to go to the owners or the lessees of the property, or to whom would they have to go to get permission to make the investigation?

Mr. FOSTER. I think they would have to go to the lessees of the property.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means, as I take it, that the General Government has certain authority to make investigations and study. It has no authority to confer the right to go into a man's private home, or his private office, or his private property for this purpose. We give all the authority we have to study. It is up to the men who are doing the studying to get into the place where they can do it, and that must be by private consent.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Would this be considered private property, being owned by the Indian tribes?

Mr. MANN. If a man holds a lease on property, it is just as much private property as long as the lease is outstanding as though he owned the property itself.

Mr. CARTER. But the title to the real property is in the Indians, and the Federal Government is the guardian of the Indians.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but if the gentleman rents the house from me and moves into it, during his lease from me he is the owner of the house.

Mr. CARTER. Suppose something became radically wrong with the house and needed repair.

Mr. MANN. That is a matter of what the terms of the lease provided. I would not be entitled to go into a house if you had a lease giving you the right of the house during a certain term.

Mr. CARTER. So the gentleman considers this would not give any authority to go in without the permission of the lessee.

Mr. MANN. When the gentleman says permission, you can not go there over their protest. I guess they have to have a special permit to go in any mine. Mr. Chairman, I do not know I shall offer an amendment, because I have not formulated one——

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is one pending.

Mr. MANN. I do not think this provision ought to be in section 4. Section 2 gives to these officials the authority to make study in reference to mines, both as to health conditions and otherwise. The authority is broad and general, it is complete. The only thing left is for us to furnish the money for officials and for the officials to obtain an opportunity to make that study. Now, on what theory do you propose to limit that authority as to health conditions while continuing authority as to all other conditions? You can not tell me that it is more important to give these officials the right to go into a mine to study the preparation or utilization of mineral substances, to study the prevention of waste in mining or quarrying, or investigating explosives in the mine, that that is more important than it is to study the health and safety of the persons employed in the mine. The gentleman would leave the bill in such shape that the mining officials have authority, so far as we are concerned, to go into the study of the subject of explosives, but they can not go into the study of the subject of the health or safety of miners without getting a special permit.

Mr. FOSTER. The study of safety appliances, explosives, all of those subjects connected with the mine, would be included in this provision, including the safety of the employees.

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. Section 2 covers health conditions. It covers the question of increasing safety. Those are two items. It covers economic development of mining; it covers the prevention of waste in mining; it covers the investigation of explosives in mining, all separately in section 2. Under that we give general authority to go into the mine. Then you turn over to section 4 and you strike out these and everything except the study of health and safety of persons.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is entirely wrong.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not mistaken at all. That is absolutely what it is.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit, I want to call his attention to the fact that section 4 is just the reverse of what the gentleman says. It says:

That nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the Bureau of Mines or any employee of said bureau to undertake any investigation or operation in behalf of any private party, except, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the health and safety of persons employed.

And so forth.

It does not in any manner modify the authority that is contained in section 2 with regard to investigating conditions of health and safety, so that the gentleman's position is wrong.

Mr. MANN. Under section 2 authority is given to go into the mine and to make these studies by anybody for any of the purposes covered by the provisions, and the provisions are very full, but in section 4 you limit the authority to go into the mine to study health conditions and safety conditions until you get the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. You say, "in behalf of any private party." That amounts to nothing; it neither adds or detracts if the mines are owned by private parties. You can go into any man's mine, but under the terms of section 4 you have no authority to go into a private mine to study health conditions or the safety of persons employed without obtaining the consent of the Secretary of the Interior.

The CHAIRMAN. The 15 minutes has expired under the last extension.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition; it is not our fault that the Chair does not enforce the rule.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may be recognized for five minutes additional.

Mr. MANN. Have I been recognized heretofore by the Chair? I am very sure I did not have 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had 15 minutes, although he did not get it from the Chair.

Mr. MANN. I beg the Chair's pardon. I ask for recognition from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois for five minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. I understood the gentleman to state that it was no doubt the intention in the preparation of the bill that any investigation in behalf of private parties should be paid for by the private party—that is, the one receiving the benefit of the investigation—but it had not been carried out.

I call his attention to section 5 and ask him, if, in his judgment, that section is not carrying out all the proposition that he suggests and whether or not section 5 should not be construed in conjunction with section 4?

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think that that covers it. I think that section 4 is not intended as a limitation upon section 2. If it is intended as a limitation on section 2, I do not think it ought to be in here. If it is not, it is intended as an extension of authority to do this work for private parties, and if that is the case, then the private parties ought to pay for it.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will permit, my understanding is that there has been an important distinction between sections 2 and 4. It seems to me, whether I understand it correctly or not, section 2 contemplated what might be termed more or less theoretical investigations, and consideration of the subject matter therein expressed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will notice that section 4 does not cover anything in section 2 except the study of health and safety.

Mr. MILLER. I understand that.

Mr. MANN. If it is a limitation, it ought not to be in here. If it is not a limitation and it is intended to make a special study for the benefit of private owners, they ought to pay for it. That is not required by section 5.

Mr. MILLER. The only authorization for the Secretary of the Interior to make a private investigation, so far as I know, is in section 4. Admitting that some company operating a coal mine desired to install such improvements as to promote the health and safety of the miners, and was perfectly willing to pay the expense of the Government in investigation and recommendation in that respect, would the gentleman not think it was perhaps proper that authorization should be extended to the Bureau of Mines to make that investigation if it was paid for?

Mr. MANN. So far as I am concerned, they ought to have very full authority to do it at their own expense.

Mr. MILLER. Does not the gentleman think that section 5 is sufficient to meet the expense? I can find nothing else in the bill, so far as I read it, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make any investigation except this in section 4.

Mr. MANN. Section 5 is obligatory. It says:

Authorized by the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act—

"Under the provisions of this act"—

other than those performed by the Government of the United States or State government within the United States, a reasonable fee covering the necessary expenses shall be charged.

It is possible that would cover it.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS. Is it your conception that section 3, which gives the Bureau of Mines the authority to investigate these matters for private individuals, section 3 only authorizes the Government to do that particular thing, or does that reach back and cover these other things in section 2?

Mr. MANN. I remember when these things were put in the law as under the Geological Bureau, it was provided that certain investigations should be made only of materials on public land or for the use of the United States. I will not undertake to construe it, but it looked very plain, and no department has ever construed it to mean that.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman has overlooked the more comprehensive authority given before the part he has read, namely:

Investigations concerning mining, and the preparation, treatment, and utilization of mineral substances.

Without any limitation.

Mr. MANN. They have made investigations for years without any limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my understanding of the words in section 4, to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has referred, namely, the undertaking of investigations in behalf of private parties, is that it contemplates investigations that would not be general in their character and which would be clearly in the interest of, or, as the language of the bill is, "in behalf of a private party."

And section 5 provides for a charge in such cases. If that is not the meaning of the two sections, I should have the same objection to them that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has voiced or suggested, but it seems to me that that is the fair interpretation of the language. As a matter of fact, it is the only reasonable interpretation of the language. It could scarcely be called an addition to the authority which the bureau has under section 2. It is a further direction with regard to a certain character of investigations or operations which might be held to be contemplated by section 2. This language in section 4 makes it clear that such investigations in the interests of private parties were not contemplated by section 2 except by direction of the Secretary of the Interior and under the fixed scale of charges.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. BOWMAN. And an amendment has been offered striking out, on page 3, lines 17 and 18, "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior" where it is now placed and putting it elsewhere.

Let me read it as it is corrected:

That nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the Bureau of Mines or any employee of said bureau to undertake any investigation or operation in behalf of any private party except for the health and safety of persons employed—

And so forth.

And in that case, by the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. That, as I read it, is a qualification on section 2. Section 2 gives the general right. Now comes the qualification in section 4 which gives the bureau a special right to undertake an investigation for the health and safety of persons employed.

Mr. MONDELL. I suppose the amendment is more or less immaterial. Perhaps it makes it a little clearer, but it seems to me that sections 4 and 5 are quite clear as they stand, construed together.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I was going to suggest this: Would not the amendment be clear if, in lines 17 and 18, on page 3, the words "except with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior" should be omitted, because the general authority given in section 2 is under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and I think that by repeating that, "except with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior," it qualifies and lessens the force of what follows. The exception is for the health and safety of the persons employed in mining.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from South Dakota will notice, the provision in section 2 is a general provision such as is included in all of the organic acts of such bureaus, that the operations of the bureau shall be under the direction and control of the Secretary. This is a somewhat different and more specific provision, requiring the approval of the Secretary in specific cases, and it means something more than the words in section 2, which simply provide, as they should, that all the operations of the bureau shall be under the general direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who is responsible for the conduct of the bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I only want a moment's time. It does seem to me that the use of that language, "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior," after the word "except," in lines 17 and 18, gives prominence to language that is not intended to be made prominent in that section. I think if we should leave out entirely the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior" and have it simply to read, "except for the health and safety of persons employed in mining," investigations could not be made on the solicitation or for the benefit of private parties except for purposes of health and safety of employees. If it is thought best, however, to make it appear that even those must be under the direction of the Secretary, that language, "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior," could be inserted later.

Mr. MANN. That is the amendment that is pending.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If that is it, the gentleman will pardon me for having lost sight of the amendment in the midst of so much discussion upon it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division of the amendment, so that we may strike out the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior" in lines 17 and 18, and leave that out.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think if they were left out nothing would be lost, and by keeping them in a good deal of confusion would be given to the section.

Mr. FOSTER. I think they make the section clearer. It does not give the Bureau of Mines the right to go into private property, but it requires them to have the approval of the Secretary.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If you want more limitation placed on the Secretary you ought not to have it in any place except the place where it is given, preceded by "except."

Mr. MONDELL. It seems to me that the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior" should be put in at some point. In administration the effect would be this: That while the general operations of the bureau would be carried on by the Director of the Bureau of Mines under the general direction of the Secretary and under general rules and regulations promulgated by him, the sort of investigation proposed here in each specific case would, as a matter of administration, be referred to the Secretary's office before being entered upon. It occurs to me that is probably a wise provision.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If the provision is wise, it ought to be dropped after the word "except," because it seems to qualify the exception. I think the amendment to strike it out where it follows the word "except" is very proper, and there could be no objection to adding the same language after the word "industries," in line 20. Then it would read, "except for the health and safety of persons employed in the mining, quarrying, and metallurgical or other mineral industries, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is the amendment that is pending.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Then, please construe my remarks as supporting the pending amendment.

Mr. POWERS. Would it not be better to leave out altogether the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior"?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Why?

Mr. POWERS. Because in a mine owned by private individuals, in the case of an accident where you might want to rush a mining rescue car into the mine for the relief of the entombed miners, you would be put to the necessity of waiting to get authority from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman understand that any such accident would come under the provisions of this section?

Mr. POWERS. Where does it come?

Mr. MONDELL. That is the ordinary work of the bureau.

Mr. POWERS. Where do you get that authority?

Mr. MONDELL. That is not in the interest of private individuals. It is in the interest of the general public.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman please point out where that authority is given?

Mr. MONDELL. In section 2.

Mr. POWERS. Point out the particular part of section 2 where you get that authority.

Mr. MONDELL. It is clearly granted in that section, as I endeavored to point out on a former occasion.

Mr. POWERS. You do not point it out.

Mr. MONDELL. Because whatever the bureau does will be with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and they will not be hampered by the fact that they have authority over it.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that if section 4 is not maintained in the bill that the power afforded the Bureau of Mines and Mining in section 2 might be abused for the benefit of individuals instead of for the public?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Quite possibly; but I think if the amendment is in the language suggested it will meet the situation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to appeal to the Members to let us dispose of this bill. We have been here for three Wednesdays on a four-page bill having the unanimous report of the committee and recommended by the Interior Department and the Chief of the Bureau of Mines and Mining. There are about 400 Members here, and we are drawing $20 a day. We have virtually expended $25,000 in the consideration of the bill which we ought to have passed in two hours.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Which never ought to be passed at all.

Mr. AUSTIN. Well, then, vote it up or vote it down. It ought to have been disposed of in two hours. If the American people could see and understand our methods, they would be completely discouraged and disgusted with the American Congress.

There are 57 committees, and they have been working industriously to get on the calendar bills that are of local and general interest. They are here, and the only way to have them considered at all is either by unanimous consent or by their consideration under the call on Calendar Wednesday. There are just 52 Wednesdays in the year, and we are in session about six months during the long term. Here we are rushing to adjourn this Congress with this calendar filled with important bills that many of us are interested in, and we will have 3 months or 90 days' session beginning in December, and it will practically require all the time to pass the supply or appropriation bills, and we will be virtually without an opportunity to dispose of this legislation. Then the new Congress will come along, and we will work over these bills again and put them on the calendar.

I come here every day interested in trying to discharge my duties as a Member of this House, and I admit that I am thoroughly disgusted at the manner with which we are trifling with the public business. I wish there was some way or means by which we could stop it and make good by passing needed legislation for the people that sent us here. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate be closed on these amendments in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendments close in two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, our distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] sometimes gets impatient. Here is an illustration. He complains because the House is considering this bill. What is the bill? It is a bill of great importance—to amend a law passed only two years ago, while the gentleman from Tennessee himself was on the floor urging then, as he does now, that the bill be passed without consideration. It was passed then, and it ought to have had full consideration then. If it had been fully considered there would be no occasion now to take up the time of the House in amending it. It was because gentlemen in the House who were so impatient then to pass a bill, regardless of consideration, without attention to its details, that within two years' time the House is called upon to entirely remodel the law, correct the bill, strike out everything that was in it, and to insert new things. Certainly, having that experience in mind, it is perfectly proper that the House give consideration to the details of a law to create and maintain a bureau of tremendous importance; the original law having failed to accomplish the purpose. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, to strike out the words "with the approval of the Secretary," in lines 17 and 18, page 3.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the next amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 20, after the word "industries," insert the words "and with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that the gentleman in charge of the bill has offered a great many more amendments to it than any of the rest of the gentlemen on the floor, if the bill has the unanimous report of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 24, after the word "mines," insert "at a compensation not to exceed $10 per day."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman can not do that now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to protect my rights.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman from New York knows the rules.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I simply wish to state to the Chair that I desire to offer an amendment to strike out that proviso.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say that the gentleman is not in order now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am in order to raise a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] offered an amendment, and the Chair has recognized him on that amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That does not preclude me from stating a question of order.

Mr. MANN. What is the question of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I state to the Chair that I desire to offer an amendment to strike out this proviso, and in view of the experience of the Chair recently in this House I wish to know whether the Chair will hold that the motion will be in order after the disposition of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is very clearly of the opinion that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is entitled to the floor on his amendment perfecting the proviso before the gentleman from New York is in order to move to strike it out. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is recognized.

Mr. FOSTER. The amendment that I have offered is to limit the compensation of any expert help which the Bureau of Mines may employ temporarily, so that it shall not exceed $10 a day. During the general debate some question was developed in the minds of those here about this provision. I do not desire to take up that matter now, but would like to have a vote first upon the question of the compensation. Then the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] can be taken up later. I want to state in addition that this is an amendment which was suggested after the bill had been reported, the committee thinking it proper that it should be limited.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the proviso, it is a mere limitation upon the provision that no person shall be employed who has any personal or private interest in a mine or mines under investigation?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Might it not readily occur that they might wish to employ somebody who was connected with some mine in the investigation of some other mine, where they might have to pay more than $10 a day? I take it that this is in the main intended for temporary employment.

Mr. FOSTER. Exactly; that is what it is meant for.

Mr. MANN. You might get people to work for nothing, to get the credit for it, but as a rule you do not get the most expensive people to work for $10 a day, because then they get neither money nor credit.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my colleague is probably correct as to that, but the intention is that a mining engineer outside of the Bureau of Mines, who might own an interest in a mine, could be employed for temporary work for investigation of some kind that might last a little while.

Mr. MANN. But here is a mine owner who may be a brilliant man. They may want his services at some other mine for two or three days in case of accident.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. You might get his services for nothing, but you would not get them for $10 a day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You would not get his services for nothing, because the law prohibits that.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I understand; but under this provision you might get him for nothing if you had the power, but you probably would not get him for $10 a day. You might get him for $50 a day or $100 a day for two or three days.

Mr. FOSTER. In a conversation with the Director of the Bureau of Mines it was stated, just as my colleague says, that it is a difficult matter to get these men at $10 a day.

Mr. MONDELL. It seems to me that there is some misunderstanding as to the character of this provision. As I understand it, this is not a prohibition against employing men who are interested in mines. It is a prohibition against employing a man interested in a mine or the products of a mine that is under investigation, and the exception would allow the employment of a person who is interested in the mine which is being investigated.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. MONDELL. There is no punctuation here.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman from Wyoming to claim that the director of this bureau may own a mine?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will read the language——

Mr. MANN. I have read it a number of times. I admit it is susceptible of doubt.

Mr. MONDELL. If that is the intent, then there should be a punctuation point.

It says:

Nor shall the director or any member of said bureau have any personal or private interest in any mine or the product of any mine under investigation.

That is not a prohibition against their having an interest in a mine. If that is the intent, then it should either be differently written or it should be punctuated.

Mr. MANN. I think it means any mine or the products of any mine under investigation. You can not tell whether he is going to be interested in the product of a mine under investigation in advance, but you can tell whether he is interested in any mine or not.

Mr. MONDELL. If the intention is to prohibit the director or any member of the bureau from having any interest in any mine that may be investigated, within the general scope of the activities of the bureau, then the words "under investigation" should be stricken out.

Mr. MANN. No. Here is the point. It is intended to prevent the director having any interest in any mine, but he can still buy his coal from a mine that is not under investigation; but if he is investigating a coal mine he can not buy coal from that mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out lines 23, 24, 25, on page 3, and lines 1 and 2 on page 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by striking out lines 23, 24, and 25, and page 4 by striking out lines 1 and 2.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered to prevent the repetition of what was the practice in that branch of the Government service under which this work was conducted before the organization of the Bureau of Mines. Before the organization of the Bureau of Mines the technologic branch of the Geological Survey conducted this work. In 1908 an investigation disclosed that a number of men who were employed as professors in various colleges or who were employed by various States in official capacities were upon the paid roll of the technologic branch of the Geological Survey, and were receiving from the Federal Government, in addition to their other compensation, compensation at the rate of $8 or $10 per day. In addition, they were allowed at the rate of $2.50, or otherwise, for clerical services. In a hearing held by the Committee on Appropriations in 1908 the following transpired:

The CHAIRMAN. In your letter addressed to me as chairman of the committee, under date of March 20, 1908, you state:

"The following were employed during the larger portion of their time on regular duties connected with college instruction, and were appointed in a consulting capacity to the Geological Survey and paid only for time devoted to such consultation, and the proportion of working time for which they were actually so employed in the service of the United States has been about one-third in each case, except as otherwise indicated."

Then follows:

"Prof. R. H. Fernald, consulting engineer, gas-producer tests, is professor of mechanical engineering, Case School of Applied Science, Cleveland, Ohio, at about $3,000 per annum. His survey compensation is $10 per day when actually employed.

"He is allowed a stenographer, at $2.50 per day, when actually employed.

"Prof. N. W. Lord, chief chemist, is professor of chemistry in the Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio, at about $1,800 per annum. His survey compensation is $10 per day when actually employed.

"He is also allowed a stenographer, at $2.50 per day, when actually employed.

"Prof. L. P. Breckenbridge, consulting engineer, steam tests, is professor of mechanical engineering, University of Illinois, Urbana, Ill., at about $3,000 per annum. His survey compensation is $10 per day when actually employed.

"Edward E. Somermeier, assistant to chief chemist, is professor of chemistry in the Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio, at about $1,200 per annum. His survey compensation is $8 per day when actually employed, his working time in the service of the United States being about one-half."

Prof. Charles A. Davis, consulting expert, peat investigations, is professor of geology of the University of Michigan, at about $1,500 per annum. His survey compensation is $7 per day when actually employed.

Then, there are 15 engineers, chemists, geologists, and collaborators named in this letter, who receive compensation of from $5 to $10 per day when called in consultation.

In other words, these gentlemen, all employed by different universities and colleges and in other employments at a fixed annual compensation, conducted certain tests in the laboratories in which they were supposed to discharge the duties for which they were being employed by those institutions and were paid by the Government of the United States.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One moment. They would state the portion of their time which they had devoted to the work of the Federal Government and collect from $5 to $10 per day for their services. I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER. Does not the gentleman think that where a professor of chemistry in a great State university, like the State University of Ohio, gets only $1,800 a year, and his assistant gets $1,200, it would be in the interest of humanity and the promotion of science and education for the Government of the United States to come to the relief of such a State and also of the professors and pay them extra money?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield any further.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I suppose this is of sufficient importance not to be trifled away by any such frivolous remarks as the gentleman from Minnesota tried to inject into what I was saying.

If this Bureau of Mines is of such character and so important an institution of the Federal Government, it has and will have, regardless of what the belief may have been as to the propriety of establishing the bureau, such technical and other assistance as are required to perform the work devolving upon it. It is a very bad and indefensible practice to have scattered throughout the country certain technical and scientific gentlemen, devoting the greater, if not the major, or nearly all of their time to some private employment, to be upon the pay rolls of some Government bureau, making casual investigations, being consulted and advertising themselves as United States Government experts in order to aid their private employment. We have had a notorious case of that character right under our own observation here within the last few years. The practice, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, can not be defended; it is not good administration. If those gentlemen's services are required and needed, they should be had exclusively for the Government. We should have the benefit of their training and ability——

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). And we should employ them in the bureau. We should not encourage this cooperation in the discharge of the Government business by the establishment of a number of independent agencies throughout the country supposedly under the control of the Bureau of Mines but actually not.

Mr. BOWMAN. I think the purpose of the committee and the purpose of the bill in this case was to get the services of men, particularly in the case of accidents, where men in a given locality would know something about the particular mine in question. That has been one of the principal questions that has arisen when the bill was considered by the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If that has been the intention of the committee, it has not been fortunate in expressing its purpose. Under this provision and under the amendment adopted at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois the purpose is to reestablish a practice which was stopped a few years ago. It should not be reestablished. Gentlemen who are employed by these universities or employed in departments of a State conducting similar work should be confined to that work and should not have their incomes increased by such employment and have the advantage of advertising to the world that they are experts of the Bureau of Mines of the Government of the United States in order to aid them in securing additional employment at largely increased compensations.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the argument of the gentleman from New York proves too much. Any head of a Government bureau who will employ and pay out of the Federal Treasury for alleged services not actually rendered under a provision like the one under consideration, would also take into the Government service and retain in the Government service an altogether useless and unworthy person. [Applause.] The gentleman objects to an abuse which he says the committee discovered several years ago. My opinion is that the official or officials who are responsible for that abuse, if it existed to the extent the gentleman believes it did, should have been relieved of their positions. That is the way to cure that kind of abuse. [Applause.] I have a great deal of sympathy with the gentleman's feeling with regard to that sort of thing. My attention has been called to it on several occasions, and at one time I offered an amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill, which is still carried on that bill, to prevent exactly that kind of abuse; and yet it is true, and the gentleman from New York will agree with me that it often occurs that there are men outside of the Government service, men who do not care to go into the Government service, men to whom permanent Government employ does not appeal, who can render exceedingly valuable service temporarily, either in a specific investigation or in the preparation of papers in which they set out for the use of the public the results of their experiences and investigations. Now, that sort of thing may be exceedingly valuable, and every Government bureau, it seems to me, ought to have an opportunity, with proper safeguards, to avail itself of that kind of useful service, and if we discover that a head of a bureau is abusing that sort of permission, the way to cure it is to get a new bureau chief, because, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, a man who will abuse that kind of discretion will abuse any and all discretion lodged in him. But I do not believe it wise to deprive the public, the Government, the people, of the useful and beneficial services of experts in these matters simply because some bureau chief sometimes has abused the opportunity to employ such men. There have been abuses of a similar discretion, and at the time it occurred I think there was abundant reason for separating from the public service the men under whose authority that abuse existed, but the provision itself is a wise one and is in the interest of the public service. We may very often, for a comparatively small sum, secure the benefit of the services or experience of men who have had vast and varied experience. We may be able to secure views and opinions from men who have widely investigated important subjects, and in many cases that is the cheapest way of securing the information and obtaining the investigation which we desire. I will join the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] in surrounding this provision with safeguards so as to make its abuse difficult, and then I will join with him in insisting upon the separation from the public service any man who is so careless of his obligations as to abuse the discretion given him.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word. I am in harmony with this amendment to strike out this proviso. I had a bit of conversation—and I do not care to quote the name of the gentleman with whom I had it—with a man that is very familiar with this service and has been, if not now, connected with it, and is entirely friendly to the bill. I objected to this proviso. I said, "What is the object of it? It is broad, without any limitation." He said, "Perchance, if we want to investigate a condition in a certain mine or mines, we sometimes can go and find an employee or somebody who lives in the neighborhood who knows about the conditions." I said, "Do you not propose to have fair men and able men for inspectors—experts that have no interests or feeling, that do not in any way care about who owns the mine or operates it—and do you not think you can get better service, although you might have to pay traveling expenses?" He said, "I do not know but that is so."

Now, I am aware of the abuse that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has referred to, and I apprehend that perchance the truth is not one-tenth part told. This is a great service. Here is an important bureau, and I am in sympathy with it and its work. It is true it goes by permission. And yet there is a great result to be gained even when the United States volunteers to make the investigation, when only ordinarily permission is given—frequently invited—and it is of such importance that I am for this bureau. But let us read:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as preventing the employment by the Bureau of Mines in a consulting capacity—

Do you not see that is permanent?

or in the temporary investigation of special subjects—

Of whom?

of any engineer or other expert whose principal practice is outside of such employment by said bureau.

A lump sum appropriated for; they do not keep track of it, and perhaps there is favoritism. The United States, when it makes the appropriation, is entitled to utilize the service of competent employees, and this service is so important that I desire that the Bureau of Mines will never lack for a sufficient appropriation to carry on this work, but employ, from the head of that bureau down to every inspector, very skilled and competent men, unprejudiced and unaffected by local conditions.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I will.

Mr. BOWMAN. As one who has had some experience in mining, I would say that it is utterly impossible for the United States to employ sufficient men to carry out the purpose of this bureau properly without the authority to employ men in special cases as provided for in that section. Let me illustrate. An accident is likely to occur in any given section. Even the inspectors cover a wide area. It is impossible for them to be fully acquainted with the conditions in all of these mines. There may be a man many times——

Mr. CANNON. I did not yield for the whole of my time.

Mr. BOWMAN. I thought the gentleman wanted a statement.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I have it, in substance. Now, mind you, what can be done when the bureau, or its agents, goes to the mines? But this is what? It is far broader in a consulting capacity, permanent employment of somebody that has employment outside, or in a temporary investigation of special subjects—any engineer or expert who is from professional practice outside of such employment of said bureau. I shall vote for the amendment for the reason assigned and for many others that I think might be assigned.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, so that there may be no misunderstanding as to the purpose of this proviso, I want to say that the committee did not have in mind, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOWMAN], the payment of men for brief periods of time to show the agents of the bureau through a mine when a disaster has occurred. Nothing of the kind entered the minds of the committee. As a matter of fact, whenever any disaster has occurred in any of the mines of the United States, if there were any of the men alive and at liberty, they were willing without compensation to go through the mines in search of those who still remained there. So it does not require compensation for that purpose. But what they did desire to do was to secure the services of men who were conversant with the local conditions, secure those services in a consulting capacity, and get their advice and their knowledge of local conditions in the carrying out of the general work of this bureau.

For instance, in the region that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOWMAN] comes from, they have immense cave-ins, where the surface goes down into the mine where the coal has been removed. Experiments are being made of methods by which the workings can be filled, so that those cave-ins will not take place.

It is a benefit to the entire community to prevent those cave-ins from taking place. The engineers who are employed in that region are more familiar with what has been accomplished, the experiments that have been made, the results that come from those experiments than any engineers that are employed by the bureau. To be able to consult with them with regard to work of that kind would enable the bureau to get information necessary to proceed upon much more cheaply than if they had to go into that region and begin the study of the entire subject from the beginning. And what applies to cave-ins in the anthracite region applies also to the local conditions in almost every mining field in the United States. There are no two of these fields where the conditions are exactly alike. There are no two fields where the composition of the coal is exactly the same. The composition is different, and, being different, there is a difference in inflammability with the coal dust in those fields. The men who are regularly employed as engineers and experts in those fields know more about the actual qualities and conditions surrounding the fields than any expert from the Bureau of Mines would know who might be sent in there for the purpose of making an investigation; and by having this proviso inserted here will enable the bureau to go into these fields and avail themselves of the information which these experts and engineers have, and from that basis of acquired information proceed with the investigations.

In my judgment it would be an assistance to the bureau and a benefit all around to allow this proviso to remain in here, and to guard it and watch it so that it will not be abused, as has been the case where this power has been given to some bureaus, as stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 25, strike out the word "temporary," and in line 24, page 3, after the word "the" and before the word "employment," insert the word "temporary."

Mr. CANNON. So that it will read——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, as amended, the paragraph or proviso will read as follows:

That nothing herein shall be construed as preventing the temporary employment by the Bureau of Mines, in a consulting capacity or in the investigation of special subjects, of any engineer—

And so forth.

It applies the word "temporary" to all of this employment, instead of to the latter character. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: On line 24, page 3, after the word "mines," insert the words "with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 24, by inserting, after the word "mines," the words "with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. FOSTER. Let me ask the gentleman this question: These experts are employed through the Secretary of the Interior, of course?

Mr. RAKER. No; not at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; and when one of them is employed, they must notify the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes; they do. I know what I am talking about.

Mr. RAKER. On this particular subject the language is different. On lines 23 and 24 it provides "that nothing herein shall be construed as preventing the employment" of these men "by the Bureau of Mines." Now, that is a special provision, and it does not relate to the control of this temporary employment by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest this to the gentleman from California: The Bureau of Mines is an important bureau. I think its appropriations amount to about $500,000 a year.

The bureau ought to be permitted to have some power. The Secretary of the Interior can not bother to act simply as Chief of the Bureau of Mines, and if everything that the director has to do is so tied up with these restrictions, requiring the specific approval of the Secretary of the Interior, we might better abolish the position of Director of the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. RAKER. No. His power is somewhat extended, and we think rightfully, by this bill. This is a special authorization to get men outside of the service for particularly important subjects.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose you were to strike out their employment by the Bureau of Mines. Then they would be employed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. RAKER. They would be employed as other people are. It comes to the same thing if you take it out, but I do not believe employment as vitally important as this ought to be left to the bureau alone. This provision would require the joint action of the bureau and the Secretary of the Interior. I want to do everything I can to make this bureau efficient. It is a great bureau and doing great work for the general mining interests, and I would rather extend than curtail it in any way. The miners of the West have been working for this bureau for years. They want its activities extended to the mining of the West. This bill will permit it. Every consideration possible should be extended to the miner and his great industry.

Mr. FOSTER. It is done through the Secretary of the Interior, anyway. The gentleman might move to strike out the words "by the Bureau of Mines."

Mr. RAKER. I withdraw my present amendment and simply move to strike out the words "by the Bureau of Mines."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "by the Bureau of Mines."

Mr. RAKER. That covers it.

Mr. MILLER. I do not care to be heard to any extent, but I sincerely hope that that amendment will not prevail. It seems to me utterly absurd to provide for an elaborate, large bureau like this and put at the head of it a very able man, like the one who is in charge of it now, and say that he can not hire a man for one day to go to some mine to see what the health conditions of that mine are. It seems to me the height of absurdity, and that it would cripple the utility of this bureau most effectively.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the director of the bureau has the power and authority under the bill to get the necessary assistance. That is the purpose of it. Now, you are going to give him the power to get engineers and experts outside of the service. When it becomes necessary for him to do that, because of the importance of the circumstances and surroundings or the value of the property, ought not the Secretary of the Interior and the Director of the Bureau of Mines to consult over as important an employment as that when these high-priced experts are being employed?

Mr. MILLER. Now, the gentleman has stated a different state of facts and one entirely covered by the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER]. As far as I am advised, and I have looked into it somewhat, the bureau has never employed and could not employ any man in the capacity suggested without the order of the Secretary of the Interior after consultation and report to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. RAKER. Very well. This bill leaves it in such a position that the Bureau of Mines can do it.

Mr. MILLER. If the bureau needs to employ any distinguished engineer or any man for anything like an extended piece of work, like a general, comprehensive investigation of several mines, requiring a period of time, that must come under the methods suggested by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not the very object and purpose to employ a man of standing and ability to make special investigations under the Bureau of Mines if, after consultation, the Secretary of the Interior thinks it is advisable and proper? This is no temporary 5-cent man's job. It is to be temporary work of a magnitude that requires a man of ability to investigate it.

Mr. FOSTER. These men are not employed except with the consent and authority of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. RAKER. I so understand it.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not favor the gentleman's amendment. I simply suggested that if he wanted to do so he could offer it in that way. The director can not make any employment now without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, and will not in the future.

Mr. BOWMAN. I trust the gentleman will not insist on the change.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk proceeded with and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the other day when this bill was under consideration the gentleman from New York offered an amendment to line 20, page 2, limiting the investigation of fuels to mineral fuels. The question was suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] that this might not include peat. I have investigated that question, and I find that probably the gentleman from Minnesota is right about it and that it is questionable whether it would include peat or not. That is an important matter to a State like Minnesota and some others, and I ask unanimous consent that the word "peat" be inserted so that it will read "peat and mineral fuels." The gentleman from New York has no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 20, insert the word "peat," so that it will read "peat and mineral fuels."

The amendment was agreed to.

[Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the several amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and Mr. SHERLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MARTIN of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17260) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish in the Department of the Interior a Bureau of Mines," approved May 16, 1910, and had directed him to report the same back, with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, they will be put in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, it had escaped my memory for the time being, but there was some objection made to the words "United States," on page 1, line 9, of the bill, by the gentleman from New York, and I ask unanimous consent that the words "United States," page 1, line 9, be stricken out.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will have to ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote ordering the bill to a third reading, and recur to the second reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was about to suggest that the request of the gentleman from Illinois will be modified to the extent of asking unanimous consent that the order for the third reading of the bill be vacated, and the words "United States," in line 9, page 1, be stricken out. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. MILLER and Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, by unanimous consent, were given leave to extend remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee on Mines and Mining having occupied two days, the Clerk will call the next committee in order.

The Clerk called the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Is the committee at liberty to call up bills without respect to the order in which they stand on the calendar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is within the discretion of the committee.

CUSTOMHOUSE, BOSTON, MASS.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 24227) to amend section 11 of an act entitled "An act to grant additional authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out certain provisions of the public building act, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1909.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill being on the Union Calendar, the House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 11 of chapter 318 of the acts of 1909, entitled "An act to grant additional authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out certain provisions of the public building acts, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1909, be amended by striking out, in the last three lines of said section, the words "including expenses incident to the temporary removal of the force employed in the customhouse during the enlargement, remodeling, or extension."

That such amounts as the Secretary of the Treasury has charged against the appropriation for the customhouse, Boston, Mass., for expenses incident to the temporary removal of the force employed in the customhouse during the enlargement, remodeling, or extension of said customhouse shall be repaid to said appropriation from moneys in the Treasury to be hereafter appropriated.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill reported unanimously from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been rendered necessary by a situation which has developed in the city of Boston, Mass., in connection with the construction of the customhouse there. Several years ago it was found to be necessary to construct a larger customhouse at Boston, Mass. There was appropriated the sum of $500,000 to purchase a site. This sum was found inadequate, and it was then determined that a building could be erected in which the customs officials could be housed by building a tall, square, tower-like structure on top of the present old granite building. The city laws do not allow buildings to be constructed to a greater height than 125 feet, but in order to enable the Government to save the purchase price which it would be obliged to pay for another location the citizens made no protest. There were then outlined plans for the erection of a customhouse about 500 feet in height which should be erected on the center of the present old granite building. Two million dollars were asked for the construction of the building, but Congress authorized the sum of $1,800,000, and in granting that authorization put in the following language, which is section 11, chapter 318, of the act of 1909, approved March 4, 1909:

That the total cost of said enlargement, remodeling, or extension of said customhouse building shall not exceed $1,800,000, including expenses incident to the temporary removal of the force employed in the customhouse during the enlargement, remodeling, or extension.

That is, that all of the expenses were to be taken from this $1,800,000. The Treasury Department proceeded to hire an office building and to move the customs force into that building. Then the contracts were let for the construction of the foundation of the structure. These foundations have been all built, and when bids were received for the construction of the tower as originally planned it was found that the amount exceeded by some $337,000 the amount available under the appropriation. The reason that it exceeded the sum was because of the fact that against this appropriation of $1,800,000 there had been charged for architects' fees $84,905.66, and for rent, services, and contingent expenses a sum of about $262,421.76. In addition to that, the contracts for the foundations, which are already in, have come to $349,732.01, making a total of $697,059.43, which has been expended up to the present time. It will be necessary under this act, as now interpreted by the department, to continue to charge rent against this account, which would amount to $200,000, and you have the amount decreased by the sum of $897,059.43, which would leave a balance of only $902,940.57.

The purpose of this bill is to remove from this account the charges for rent, so that there will be available for the construction of this building the sum of $1,800,000, as was undoubtedly originally intended. At the present time the Government can not go on with the structure. The Government officials are housed in a temporary building, for which they are obliged to pay $84,000 a year rent, which, together with other incidental expenses, amounts to $97,000 per annum. Of course this expense for rent, and so forth, will cease as soon as the customs officials are housed in this building, and the delay in passing this act means to the Government the loss of the sum of about $8,000 a month.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. There will be additional expense charged, necessarily, for temporary removal of this force. Some expenses have already been incurred, and there will be others, will there not?

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman think the language of the bill is broad enough to cover the expenses in the future? If the gentleman will look at the language on the second page he will see that it reads—that such amounts as the Secretary of the Treasury has charged, etc.

Does the Secretary of the Treasury have further amounts to charge?

Mr. PETERS. I think under the wording of the bill we propose to repeal the provisions of the first act under which these charges were made, and I think no future charges for rent could be made under this act as it is amended. The allotments and contracts which have already been made amount to $697,059.43, and it is necessary to have this work start at once. The contract for the erection of the building above the foundation has been held up now pending the consideration of this measure, and each month that the contract is held up means just one month later that the Government officials will be placed in their quarters in the building, and that means $8,000 paid out for rent of buildings and incidental expenses which would be saved as soon as these officials are housed.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman kindly give the amount of Government receipts at the port of Boston?

Mr. PETERS. Compared with the receipts of the port of Boston this expense involves comparatively a trifling amount. There was received for the year 1910 in customs duties at the port of Boston the sum of $29,634,555, that being next to the greatest receipts received at any customs district in the United States, second only to New York.

Mr. AUSTIN. This building, as I understand it, as contemplated will be large enough to house not only the present Government officials but for many years to come?

Mr. PETERS. It is expected it will meet all requirements for the customs service in Boston for at least 60 or 70 years to come, and that is as far ahead as any estimate or understanding can be made in regard to the matter.

Mr. BOEHNE. I would like to inquire of the gentleman why should we get ready to build a structure there to be ample for 70 years ahead?

Mr. PETERS. Well, there is a very rapid increase in the customs receipts at that port, and the size of this building has been determined by experts as the size which will supply the needs of that port in the most economical way.

Mr. BOEHNE. Does not the gentleman think a building of 400 feet would have accomplished all that ought to be accomplished at this time and reduce the expenditures of this building to the amount in accordance with what was appropriated at the time?

Mr. PETERS. I am afraid not. The necessary foundations would have to be put in, and this building was worked out by architects having in view the most economical use of the space at hand.

Mr. SABATH and Mr. BUTLER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. How much was the original appropriation for the construction of this building?

Mr. PETERS. One million eight hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SABATH. How much has been expended up to date?

Mr. PETERS. There has been expended up to the present time $697,095.43.

Mr. SABATH. And you maintain there will be a shortage of how much? How much will this bill carry?

Mr. PETERS. This bill carries no appropriation, but it allows——

Mr. SABATH. I know——

Mr PETERS (continuing). But it allows the use of the original appropriation. At the time when the appropriation was made it was not expected that the items for rent, and so forth, would be so large nor that they would be subtracted from this $1,800,000.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman explain why the amounts are so high, namely, rent? Why has it been necessary to expend $90,000 for a temporary structure in the city of Boston? That is, annually and not two years, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. PETERS. It was necessary to obtain particularly large quarters in order to house the whole customhouse force. I know nothing about the negotiations, but I assume they secured quarters as economically as possible.

Mr. SABATH. How many square feet are being used now for which the Government pays $90,000 a year?

Mr. PETERS. It is a good-sized seven-story building in the city. I do not know what the floor space of the present quarters is.

Mr. SABATH. Where in the city of Boston is this building located which is now in use?

Mr. PETERS. Tremont Street and Temple Place.

Mr. SABATH. That is not the most expensive section of the city or it is not the real business section of Boston, is it?

Mr. PETERS. It is just about where the highest priced real estate property is located, in the vicinity of this building.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman know who owns that building?

Mr. PETERS. No; I do not.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman know who secured the lease for that building?

Mr. PETERS. I know nothing about the negotiations of the lease or who secured it. That went through the department, and I can answer nothing more than that.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman know whether the department has made any effort to secure better and cheaper quarters than this building?

Mr. PETERS. I have never heard any complaints about it, and I do not know anything about it.

Mr. AUSTIN. I desire to state to the gentleman that it developed at the hearings that this was the only suitable building they could secure in Boston conveniently located to house all the Government employees in one building.

Mr. SABATH. Do I understand that there is no other building in Boston suitable for this purpose?

Mr. AUSTIN. The statement made by the representative of the Treasury Department to the committee was that this was the most suitable building they could secure conveniently located for the transaction of public business and large enough to house the entire Government force.

Mr. PETERS. A committee aided in finding a location for it, and I have never heard any criticism of the choice or of the rent.

Mr. SABATH. How long has this building been used now as a temporary Government structure?

Mr. PETERS. About two years.

Mr. SABATH. How long will it be necessary for the Government to occupy possession of this structure?

Mr. PETERS. It will be necessary——

Mr. SABATH. Another two years?

Mr. PETERS. About two years to complete the construction of the building. So long as we delay the commencement of the construction, just that much longer will the Government have to pay this rent for outside quarters.

Mr. SABATH. So that by that time the Government will have paid about $350,000 to $400,000 as rental for this structure which the Government now occupies?

Mr. PETERS. I suppose so.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman know the value of this building?

Mr. PETERS. I decline to yield further. It has nothing to do with the merits of this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. With pleasure.

Mr. BUTLER. The language that the Government uses is a part of the language of the general statute, and provides for part of the general customhouse at Boston. I can not understand how it got in the bill.

Mr. PETERS. I have thought it strange that such language should be placed in the bill, but that is the difficulty we are placed in.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the very reason of the merit of the bill, because the language of the statute was that there was an appropriation that the authorization should include expenses of the temporary removal of the force employed in the customhouse. The Treasury Department considered that to mean rentals as well as the transmission of the property and retransmission of the building. It does seem to me in order to contract for the construction of the building there ought to be a certainty about it, and as long as there is uncertainty about that rental there can be no contract for the construction of the building, although the foundation has been excavated and is ready for the erection of the building.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Does not the gentleman think the department should know about what it should cost in case the old building is given up and the time it would take to construct? Do you not think that when they make their estimates they should properly recommend or report to the House?

Mr. BURNETT. They could not know about the length of time it would take for the construction of the building.

Mr. SABATH. That is their building, is it not? It is the department's business to ascertain.

Mr. BURNETT. The very uncertainty of the language of the bill has hindered a contract for the consummation of the building itself. They have gone on and made an excavation, costing some two hundred and odd thousand dollars, but that is as much as they can get unless they know how much money they can contract for for the completion of the building.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there is something wrong in this bill. I have a bill marked, after examination, as being a bill that ought not to pass. The report on the case is not very satisfactory. I think that I shall take the liberty of mildly criticizing the Treasury Department for sending in this kind of a report upon a bill, as I had occasion to do the other day. The Secretary of the Treasury, in making a report upon this bill says, in addressing the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives:

SIR: Referring to your request for a report in connection with H. R. 24227, a bill to amend section 11 of an act to grant additional authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out certain provisions of the public buildings acts approved March 4, 1909, I have the honor to inform you that the department sees no reason why the proposed amendment should not accomplish the result desired, to wit, practically increase the appropriation for the new customhouse at Boston, Mass.; and it is believed that with this amount of appropriation the customhouse building can be constructed.

There is absolutely no information whatever contained in that report from the Secretary of the Treasury, except that in his opinion the bill will accomplish the results desired. We have the right, in sending to the departments for reports upon these bills, to have them send us information.

Now, here is a proposition where three years ago, with full knowledge of the subject, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds provided an authorization for $1,800,000 for a new customhouse at Boston, the amount to include the cost of the temporary quarters pending the construction of the building. It said:

Including the expenses incident to the temporary removal of the force employed in the customhouse during the enlargement, remodeling, or extension.

If that does not include the quarters, then I do not understand the English language.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that the customary language?

Mr. MANN. It is not the customary language. This was a particular occasion. One million eight hundred thousand dollars was appropriated, with the distinct understanding that it would cover the expenses preliminary to the final occupation of the building. They would not have gotten $1,800,000 on any other proposition, as I understand it.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman if the act says anything about the payment of rent?

Mr. MANN. The act does not say anything about the hiring of a dray, and the act does not say anything about the employment of a carpenter to take down or put up. The act says:

> The expenses incident to the temporary removal of the force employed in the customhouse during the enlargement, remodeling, or extension.

It does not say "the temporary removal of the force from one office to another," but "during the enlargement, remodeling, or extension." There is not any question about what was intended. It was intended to cover the rent and all other temporary expenses. It was upon that basis that $1,800,000 was provided. Now, like all other cases, gentlemen get the camel's nose in and then they want to push the whole body into the tent. Having gotten the authorization on their own terms, they then turn around and want to increase the amount that is to be available for the building.

Mr. BOEHNE. By $700,000. That is what has already been expended and what is to be expended.

Mr. AUSTIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The additional amount needed is $300,000.

Mr. MANN. What is the occasion for the delay over there about letting the contract and doing the work?

Mr. AUSTIN. Simply because the plans have been drawn and the specifications prepared looking to the construction of a building to cost $1,800,000. The Government anticipates that it would take three years before this building would be completed, and the expenditure for rent of practically $300,000 of the $1,800,000 causes the committee having this matter in charge to favorably report this bill before the contract is executed and further work ordered.

Mr. MANN. Having deliberately obtained from Congress a provision under which they knew the building could not cost $1,800,000, they thereupon hold it up for more than three years to date on the theory that they will make Congress yield to them, because there is no other way of doing it.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think the gentleman is in error in stating that they have held up the construction of this building for three years, because the foundation has already been constructed.

Mr. MANN. I may be in error about the time. I do not know.

Mr. PETERS. The bids for the finished structure were only received by the department about February of this year.

Mr. MANN. Why were they not received before?

Mr. PETERS. From then until now has been the only delay, and as for the people asking more than they originally expected to get, the architect, Mr. Taylor, testified before the committee that it was expected the rent would amount to about $30,000 instead of $100,000.

Mr. MANN. They could ascertain about what the building could be rented for; but why should they hold back until this February, three years after the act was passed, before contracts were advertised for? This is not one of the ordinary cases where they have to wait because they have not the force to supply the demand for plans and specifications, for this was an exceptional case. They went ahead and moved out of the building. When did they move out of the building—three years ago, two years? Can some gentleman tell me who knows?

Mr. PETERS. I know. It was a little over two years ago.

Mr. MANN. The report says several years ago. I did not know just what that meant. Undoubtedly it was not less than two years ago.

Mr. BOEHNE. Does not this bill also provide for the assuming of the rent for the next two or three years at $84,000 a year?

Mr. MANN. It may be $184,000 a year for aught we know. I have read the last paragraph of this bill, and I was going to ask for some explanation of it. I have read it six or eight times, and I do not know what it means.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman from Illinois know how much difference in cost there would be if this building was made of brick instead of stone, for that part which is above the existing building, which they are supposed to use as a foundation for this tower?

Mr. MANN. I do not know that, but I know that if Congress provides for the construction of a building that costs $1,800,000, that sum of money can be spent on the building; and if it provides for the construction of a building to cost $1,200,000, that sum can be spent on the construction of the building; and the chances are that as far as the efficiency of the Government service is concerned the building that costs $1,200,000 will be fully as good as the building that costs $1,800,000. I have no objection to their building a monumental structure over in Boston, Mass., if they desire to do so. I can see no reason why we should increase the cost of the building at Boston, any more than we increase the cost of buildings all over the rest of the country, except that the delegation from Boston on the floor of this House is not only extremely intelligent but extremely active and persuasive.

Mr. SIMS. I should like to say to the gentleman that this House does make an exception of Boston, Mass., from the fact that we have already appropriated money out of the Treasury to reimburse an expense to which that city, State, and county have been put for removing an obstruction on a navigable stream—a thing we do not do anywhere else. Why do you want to make an exception on this thing?

Mr. MANN. I made a statement in reference to that bill, expressly calling attention to the fact that it not only was not for the benefit of Boston, but of a small community who were utterly unable to tax themselves for the benefit of the Government to an amount sufficient to accommodate the Government.

Mr. SIMS. Forty-five per cent of that appropriation went to the State of Massachusetts, and I never heard before that that was a small community.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, if it is of any interest to get the facts right in this case, may I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has stated the facts of that case so accurately that there can not be any difference of opinion about them. That bridge matter was not a Boston matter. It was Weymouth, Mass., which is an entirely separate locality.

Mr. SIMS. Does not 45 per cent of that appropriation go to the State of Massachusetts?

Mr. MURRAY. Surely.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman call that a little community, poor and poverty stricken? The State includes Boston, and therefore it can not be poor.

Mr. MURRAY. Oh, no; the gentleman has got it wrong.

Mr. SIMS. Was not 45 per cent of that money to go to the State of Massachusetts?

Mr. SABATH. That amount was saved for the street car company.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to thrash over old straw. I am not worried about the charge any gentleman makes that I might be inconsistent. That is not bothering me. I want to discuss this proposition. Here is a proposition emanating from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, giving an extra and new provision for the city of Boston, which has once been provided for. Why, Mr. Chairman, there are many places in this country that are entitled to and would like to have a public building. They can receive no consideration at the hands of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Why should we make exception for Boston? Why should the Boston Members who have been in once come here and get the ear of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds again? Why can not we have a provision for the necessary buildings in other parts of the United States? The other day we passed a bill to create a naval historical society composed of gentlemen from New York and Boston.

Now we have to take care of a Boston public building. I am perfectly willing to admit that Boston occupies a very large place in the history of the world and in the importance of this country, and yet it does seem to me that Boston is not the only city on the American Continent; that there are other places in the United States, and that there are other Members of Congress besides those who come from Boston, and who would like to receive consideration from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Why does not the committee bring in a public-building bill? Why does not the Committee on Appropriations provide for the construction of public buildings already authorized?

I know gentlemen sit here and wait, expecting that after the fall elections when the record has been made up and completed, that next winter every fellow will get all that he wants. Now, the manly thing to do, if you want to pass a public-building bill, is to pass it during this Congress before the election, pass it now, and instead of waiting until next winter to provide appropriations for buildings already authorized, provide appropriations now at this session of Congress. But gentlemen are proposing to trade away their opportunities for needed public buildings by passing little petty private bills like this, for the benefit of some particular community and some particular place.

I heard gentlemen talk bravely some time ago about how they would favor a public-building bill if it could be brought before the House. One way to help do it is not to pass these second and third attempts. These gentlemen have had their day in court. They got what they asked for. Now they ought to be willing to wait for anything additional until the rest of the bills are taken care of at the same time. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I would like to ask what reason he can give why there should be any extra sum appropriated for this building at any time.

Mr. MANN. I have already expressed my opinion, that I can see no reason why there should be anything extra now or at any other time, although I do not profess to be as familiar with the situation as are some others. Let them cut down the expense of the buildings. The department when it appropriates money for something ought to cut the garment according to the cloth. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I am a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. We had an extensive hearing on this proposition. The Republican members of that committee favored an omnibus public-building bill, but when the Democratic caucus decided upon a different program it was utterly impossible for us to carry out our views as members of that committee. Because a Democratic caucus vetoed an omnibus public-building bill does not mean that the Republicans of that committee should not favor this proposition, and every other similar proposition that was presented to us for consideration.

This bill ought to pass. The Public Building Committee reported $1,800,000, and the members of that committee believed and understood that Boston was to receive a public building that was to cost that amount. It was not contemplated, it was never dreamed, that there should be a delay of four or five years and a rental expense amounting to $90,000 a year taken out of the general appropriation for the Boston building. I ask every Member of this House to apply this particular case to his own district.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. In a moment I will yield. Had Congress authorized a public building in the city of Louisville to cost $1,800,000 and used the present site for the new building which rendered necessary the removal of the Government employees to an expensive building to be housed for three or five years, exhausting a third of that appropriation, I know very well that the able and efficient Representative from the Louisville district would be here asking and demanding of Congress that the full amount be restored to give the city of Louisville what was contemplated originally—a building to cost $1,800,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. In a moment. All of us had items in the last public-building bill, authorizing from $50,000 up to hundreds of thousands of dollars for the cities and towns in the districts we represent, and had it turned out in every one of these cases that the Treasury Department found itself without funds to meet annual rentals, running into hundreds of thousands of dollars, for three or four years, where is the Member who would have sat here and submitted to a proposition that would have exhausted the building-fund appropriation for one of his towns, carrying fifty or a hundred thousand dollars or two hundred thousand dollars or a million eight hundred thousand dollars? What the Members from Boston have a right to do is to demand that their colleagues in this House give them what they secured in the original bill and what Congress fully intended to vote them. [Applause.] Take the showing made here, wherein it is shown that Boston turns into the National Treasury $29,000,000 a year to carry on the National Government, and they ask only $1,800,000 for that city. You take that amount and compare it with the appropriations made by Congress for New York or Philadelphia or the city represented by the minority leader on the floor of this House, and we will all be frank and fair and free to say that this is a modest appropriation, considering the amount of money that Boston turns into the National Treasury and the amount of money expended by Congress in public buildings in corresponding cities of the Republic.

Mr. Chairman, some one has said we should delay this proposition until next winter. Every month's delay means $8,000 of money practically thrown away in monthly rentals. It is six months before the next Congress meets, and perhaps after it meets it will be three months before an appropriation will be made, making nine months, and nine times eight means $72,000 that we will still further take out of the Treasury and throw away in rent.

Now I will submit to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, I do not want the gentleman to submit to me. I want him to yield. I am not going to punish him. I simply want to ask this question, Whether he thinks all of the equities would exist if it were the fact that they had expected $300,000 of this money to go for rent, and that the situation is one of a building authorized to be constructed for a million and a half, actually costing, because of the mistake of the architects, $300,000 more? And what would the gentleman say if it were possible now by going ahead and constructing a building—not using quite as fine material, but getting just as good a building—not to delay the matter at all?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will say to the gentleman the committee had before it the representatives of the various departments of the Government that are going to occupy this building, and we considered the question as to the capacity of the building, not only for present needs but for future needs.

Mr. SHERLEY. When did the committee have that hearing?

Mr. AUSTIN. We had an extensive hearing upon that proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. When did the committee have it?

Mr. AUSTIN. During the present session of Congress.

Mr. SHERLEY. When?

Mr. PETERS. On April 19 and 20.

Mr. MANN. Has that hearing been printed?

Mr. PETERS. Not that I know of.

Mr. SHERLEY. Was not the meeting held a little before that time?

Mr. AUSTIN. We had an extensive hearing.

Mr. SHERLEY. When?—is what I am trying to learn.

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, I am not the clerk of the committee and do not keep the dates of the hearings. When did the gentleman from Kentucky have a hearing on his sundry civil appropriation bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. We had a hearing on the 19th of April, and I want to see whether your hearing was before or after ours.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman says he can go ahead and give Boston a building to cost $1,300,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I did not. I said they had planned a building to cost a million and a half and had missed it by $300,000.

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, we have not missed the plans at all. Plans were before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the architect was present in person, giving the committee a report upon the amount of work and character of work and the plans and specifications, and the committee considered the question of reducing the cost of the building from $1,800,000 to $1,300,000, and we determined after weighing the evidence that if we put up a $1,300,000 building it was only a question of time when Boston would be back demanding of Congress an additional building or an enlargement of the present building.

Mr. SHERLEY. What would the gentleman say if the hearings disclosed that you could put up a building, giving the exact amount of floor space as that proposed, even if this bill passes, not crowding in any particular way the floor space of the offices of the Government, for $327,000 less than that estimate?

Mr. AUSTIN. The committee discussed that question, and it would virtually strip this building of the high-class material of which it should be constructed.

Mr. SHERLEY. What does the gentleman mean by "stripped"?

Mr. AUSTIN. To substitute brick for granite—taking off the tower, where additional space was needed for storage purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Has the gentleman ever seen the Singer Building in New York?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, that is a very handsome building. They constructed that building of brick, did they not?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. And is not that true of many of the handsomest buildings in New York?

Mr. AUSTIN. Has the gentleman a brick building for the post office at Louisville?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; we have a horribly ugly stone building; one of the ugliest I have ever seen, that is a monument to the incapacity of the architect who built it.

Mr. AUSTIN. If we were going to make an appropriation tomorrow for a new building to be located at Louisville the citizens of the town would not have a brick building, but would demand either granite or Kentucky limestone.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, listen. I would not stand here and say that selfishness is local to any community, though we occasionally see a little bit more on the floor from some sections than from other places. Of course, the people of my town would try to get all they could, and because they would try to get all they could through their Representative, other Representatives, realizing that, would search with a good deal of care the statements and the representations made by the community in interest. And that is what we are doing here. I do not blame Boston for getting away with it if it can.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Representatives from Boston made a presentation of their case, and they convinced every member of the committee, Democrat and Republican alike, that they were entitled to and deserved this appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. They had less success with the Committee on Appropriations, and they brought the same distinguished architect, and I commend to the gentleman a reading of that testimony.

Mr. AUSTIN. We had all the testimony we needed. We had representative men from Boston, and nearly every branch of the Government service that is housed in the Boston building appeared before that committee. Now, Mr. Chairman, the Government has saved over a million dollars in the purchase of the site alone by the adoption of this plan and the construction of this proposed building on the present Government sites.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is that any reason why we should expend any more than we ought to expend?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; but it amounts to this: By the adoption of this plan and the location of the building the Government will save over a million dollars, and that ought to be taken into consideration in connection with the merits of this proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. Are not you going to use this site whether you get the additional $300,000 or not? Is not the real question whether you will have granite instead of brick, and whether you will have bronze in place of tile, and whether you will have bronze fittings in doors and windows in place of steel? Is not the question one of detail, not either the capacity or the sufficiency——

Mr. AUSTIN. We have gone to the extent of expending $200,000 on the foundation on the present Government lot, and all we want to do for Boston is what we will do for Louisville when the time comes, and that is commensurate with its growth and importance to give the very best the United States can afford.

Mr. BOEHNE. How about my town?

Mr. AUSTIN. Your town and my town.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why do you stop at $300,000? That does not represent the maximum in the Treasury.

Mr. AUSTIN. Because $300,000 will be the amount taken out of this fund for rent, when Congress intended the full amount, $1,800,000, should go into the construction of the building.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is not the best. The gentleman says he wants to give the best; why not go the whole way if we are starting on that road?

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention of gentlemen to the evidence of Mr. Taylor, given before the committee Saturday, the 20th, in which he said, "We calculated we would not pay more than $30,000 or $40,000 a year," having reference to the original plans at the time the estimate for rent was made.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is true, and the evidence submitted to that committee showed an effort was made to secure a cheaper and more suitable building for that purpose, and it could not be had.

Now, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL].

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Chairman, it is very easy to broaden the scope of the question before the committee. We may extend it so as to include the argument concerning the Weymouth Bridge, or whether the witches were hung, or we may bring in the question of the general policy of having a public-building bill. But the exact question before the House at the moment relates to the Boston customhouse, and that is the question that must be decided by Congress.

Now, if it is conceded that the old Boston customhouse, which was built a great many years ago, was entirely inadequate, in my opinion, the proper thing to have done was to consider building a new customhouse. The space was very contracted. It was a case fairly calling for the expenditure of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 for the National Government to build a customhouse such as we have in the other ports of the country that have any income commensurate with that of the Boston port. The Government is taking in nearly $30,000,000 a year in receipts at that customhouse. If we had gone on with the old customhouse and had continued to do business there we should be paying high rents—as expensive rents as it appears here in the debate we are paying. No one would question that the rent is reasonable, although it is costing something like $80,000 or $90,000 a year. But it was determined in the interest of economy to use the old customhouse lot, which is not large enough on which to build a building according to the modern standards, and to save space by running the building up in the air, I do not know how many feet. I do not think it will be any particular addition to the architectural beauty of Boston, but I do think, since the Government is to adopt this policy, and is to carry the building up some 400 feet in the air, a different sort of building from what they have anywhere else, it owes it to the community to have it of normal construction and not a mere eyesore.

It appears here from the evidence that the question has been studied and plans have been adopted and they can erect the building for the amount that was originally expected—$1,800,000—but when you come to take out of that four years' rental it will be impossible to erect a building that will have the proper appearance for that sum of money. This question is delaying construction and increasing the outside rental which is accumulating. The bill permits the department to carry out the projected plans and to build the building in granite, instead of having the lower stories of granite and the rest of brick. I think the case is irresistible. I shall not be put in a position here of scrambling to get anything from the rest of the country. I believe, compared with the amount of receipts from this customhouse, the expenditures of the Government for the building will be very modest indeed.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MCCALL. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think the real test of how much you shall spend for a building is the amount of custom receipts?

Mr. MCCALL. The real test?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MCCALL. I think it is, within certain limits.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not the only limit the amount of floor space necessary to accommodate all the clerks who are needed to do the amount of work?

Mr. MCCALL. I think not, necessarily. I make this as an assertion: Of course you can do a wholesale business more cheaply than a retail business. I imagine that to have this appropriation or expenditure in Boston for the building chargeable against the Boston revenue will be a very much less percentage regarding the amount of the interest on the money invested than is expended in Louisville, Ky. But that is due, of course, to the fact that you do a less business there, and you can not expect to do it so economically. But I was going to say that, except in the case of New York, I do not believe that you will find a customhouse building in the country where the percentage of cost, chargeable to rent, on the receipts collected will be as small as it will be if this plan is carried out in Boston.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, as illustrating how unreasonable a test that is, take the city of Louisville. We collect there, contrary to the gentleman's impression, a tremendous sum of money through internal-revenue taxation. According to the gentleman's theory, we ought therefore to have a building costing a great deal more than a city perhaps of a third larger size, like Rochester or Buffalo, and yet in point of fact it does not require any more floor space. I am not discussing other considerations, such as the size and character of a city and the policy of having a building in harmony with its surroundings, but I am challenging the gentleman's statement relative to income, and submit that it is in no sense a reasonable test, except as it indicates the necessary floor space.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman did not hear me lay down such a test. I understood the gentleman to assume that that was the test, and he asked me a question and I answered it, giving limitations. Then the gentleman assumed that I had based my argument upon a particular proposition, which I had not done.

Now, with reference to the internal revenue collected at Louisville, I suppose upon whisky and tobacco, the expense of doing that business is much less than that of doing customhouse business, where you have to have a force of appraisers, and watch importations, and have valuations, and things of that sort. A large part of the internal-revenue business is done by sending men out to the distillers. The practical part of it is done there. It is chiefly a matter of receiving the money.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not happen to live in Boston, but I live in Massachusetts, and I have been somewhat familiar with the discussions that arose in regard to the location of a customhouse building when it was determined that additional room was needed at the Boston customhouse.

I recollect that the leading Boston business men and committees from the Boston Chamber of Commerce and other business organizations spent a great deal of time to aid Government officials in finding a location that would be satisfactory to the business interests of Boston, which largely represents the business interests of the whole Commonwealth of Massachusetts. They failed to find a suitable location except upon an expenditure of a very large sum of money, and finally they determined that they would prefer to have changes made in the old customhouse building, increasing its size and accommodations as to room and other conveniences, as the building is in the center of the customs and business district. Therefore they evolved this plan which provided for a tower. The amount of expense was determined, and it was supposed that it would be amply sufficient to complete the building as originally designed.

In the discussion this afternoon the fact has been brought out that a cheaper method of construction might have been used; that the tower might have been built of brick instead of being built of granite. It has been contended that it might have been built of cheap brick. But it would have been a cheap-looking structure. It might even have been built of the cheapest material that could have been found.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Oh, yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think that the Singer Building, in New York, which is built of brick and is a building of the same type, can be called a cheap-looking building?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. The original customhouse building was built of granite.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the lower part of the Singer Building is built of stone also.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Oh, well, that is quite a different proposition. I think the proper material for the construction of this building would be granite. I am not going to discuss the Singer Building. I have seen it only from a distance, although I do not live very far from the city of New York. It does not make any difference what kind of a looking building the Singer Building is.

Mr. SHERLEY. The only reason why I asked the gentleman that question was because he said the building would be cheap looking if it were built of brick.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. You propose to use brick. We propose to build of granite, as it ought to be built.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is proposed to build it as Congress determines to build it.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Oh, I assume that Congress will act sensibly, although Members may talk foolishly about it when they are simply talking. [Laughter.] All these side issues that have been brought up here have absolutely no influence with me.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would expect that the gentleman, being from Massachusetts, had made up his mind when the bill was brought in; but if the gentleman will read the hearings he will not make the mistakes he has made as to the facts.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Very likely.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know it to be likely, because the gentleman would not want to state anything that the record showed to be incorrect.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Not at all. I think the proposition included in the pending bill is fair and reasonable for a city located as Boston is and with the accommodations that it needs. I think the appropriation ought to be granted, and we ought not to adopt a policy of cheeseparing, to see how cheaply the proposed building can be constructed.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not need to yield if he does not want to.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I certainly wish to.

Mr. SHERLEY. The testimony of Mr. Peabody, your architect, was that it was contemplated to build this building for $1,500,000.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. It was known that the foundation would cost just what it has cost, so that no mistake can be laid to the foundation cost.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am not trying to deny that there may have been mistakes.

Mr. SHERLEY. It was testified to by the architect here that $300,000 of the $1,800,000 was expected to cover the rental item.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, is not the fact simply this, that Congress has authorized a building to be built for $1,500,000, and your architects have planned so badly that they have missed the limit by $300,000?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That is not unusual.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; it is not unusual; and it will not be unusual until we cease to let them get additional money when they violate the law.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Do not undertake to visit Boston with punishment. They do not deserve it.

Mr. AUSTIN. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say a very few words in discussing this matter. I believe the Government should build public buildings wherever they are needed. The people do not come in contact with the Government itself at any place very closely except at the post office, and I am very heartily in favor of building public buildings wherever the rental is large enough to warrant the expenditure; but it does seem to me that in this particular instance this appropriation is entirely unnecessary. The Democratic Party had a caucus, we are told, and at that caucus they decided that at this session of Congress we should have no public-building bill. Yet apparently some districts are in danger in Boston; therefore Boston is selected out as a place to which they propose to show special favor.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. In just a moment. I notice that Boston and New England always come in for special favors. I do not care whether it is in public-building bills or tariff bills, or whether it is an appropriation for digging a ditch or removing a bridge at Weymouth, Boston and Massachusetts get their hands into the Treasury and get the money out and get what they are after.

Mr. SABATH. If I am not mistaken, the gentleman has been misinformed as to the charges that he makes against Boston, or the Members of the House from Boston. The reason why they insisted on having this bill reported, as I understand it, is in order to save the enormous rental that the Government is paying for the temporary quarters. That is the main reason that this bill has been reported and has received preference over the other bills that are now pending.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman for the information, and I call the attention of the House to the fact that the Government is paying rent for almost every third-class and second-class post office. In the little city from which I come the Government owns a site and it is paying rent, and it will pay rent until that building is completed and paid for out of the Federal Treasury. I suppose that is a good reason for building a building there. I appeared before the committee in a previous session of Congress and urged the building of a building there on that ground. Now, that thing applies to all parts of the country, to every congressional district, and the mere fact that in Boston we are paying some rent does not give this particular project any virtue over any other.

I notice that they want another $300,000 in order that they may change the building from brick to granite and put in some bronze. Why, if you will give us in the Middle West a few buildings we will be tickled to death to take brick, and we do not care for a tower either. Boston is asking for a 400-foot tower on the top of it. You have $1,800,000 already, and you have the nerve to come back to this House and ask for more.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman does not recognize the fact that $1,800,000 has been depleted by the payments of rent. That is what gives them a standing; instead of the city getting $1,800,000 it is constantly being reduced on account of the $90,000 a year rental.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. But that reason will apply to every public building wherever it is needed in a hundred places in this country.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, the facts in this case are that it was never contemplated from the beginning that more than $1,500,000 of the $1,800,000 should go for the building. I hold in my hand the testimony of Mr. Taylor to that effect, and, if desired, I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. The statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky takes away every inch of the ground on which you are standing, you gentlemen who propose to put this public-building bill through the House to-day. As I said, I do not object to building all the public buildings that are needed, but I do object to you gentlemen on this side of the House going into a little secret caucus, all by yourselves, and with doors closed, newspaper men excluded, decide that you would not bring forth a public-building bill at this session of Congress; and then, in spite of that, singling out Massachusetts for some particular reason, singling out Boston for some particular reason, when it has already been favored with $1,800,000, and asking for special favors for her.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have just received a telephone message from the Supervising Architect—and I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will give me his attention—in which he says that the original estimate submitted to Congress for this building was $1,800,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, as against his telephone communication, I will read the testimony of Mr. Taylor in regard to this building, found on page 138 of the hearings, part 1, which is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Will you make a statement so that we will know about it?

Mr. TAYLOR. The limit of cost of that building was $1,800,000, $300,000 of which was for rent, and that left $1,500,000 for the construction of the building. I believe that the estimate that was originally made was $2,000,000, which was just $500,000 more than was allowed for it.

That is his testimony under cross-examination. I submit to this House that it is not becoming in a public official to appear in his public capacity before an appropriation committee to give testimony there, and then by private telephone communication raise a doubt, even as to his own testimony.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Peabody, the architect of this building, stated when he appeared before the committee that he was notified that $1,500,000 would be available for this building, and he proceeded to prepare the plans which it required, and if the building is carried out in accordance with these plans without substitution of alternatives it would cost $1,800,000, while if the alternatives be substituted a building could be constructed for $1,500,000.

Mr. AUSTIN. One million eight hundred thousand dollars provides for granite and the other for brick.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will discuss the brick business in a little while.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to add to what has been said. It seems to me there is no reason on earth why this bill should be passed at this time; there is no reason why Boston should be singled out from every town and village in the country. I congratulate gentlemen on their sublime nerve in bringing this bill in, and I believe if it was not for the vote of the delegation from Massachusetts it would not have a corporal's guard.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat, he talks about the question of precedents. I would like to ask him if he knows any other section of the country where a building is in course of construction where the rental is as large as it is in this case in Boston which is being paid while the building is in the process of construction?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Is this building in the process of construction?

Mr. CURLEY. I should say so. Here is a picture of it.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. For how long has it been in process of construction?

Mr. CURLEY. I should judge somewhere about 14 months. They have been compelled to go down more than 100 feet to get a foundation that would be suitable for the superstructure. Ninety-six thousand dollars annually is being paid for outside rental. That in itself is sufficient reason for speedy action on the part of this House.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. The speedy action the people of Boston ought to take is to go along as they intended to do when these plans were adopted and construct a building in accordance with those plans. You are delaying the thing yourselves.

Mr. CURLEY. Oh, I am ready for a vote now.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. The facts are that the building is not good enough for Boston; that you do not care to construct the building as originally proposed; that you want a little more marble and a little more bronze; and you are the people who are delaying the construction of the building. If you will take that which is good enough for Milwaukee and Chicago and most of the other towns the size of Boston and be satisfied with it——

Mr. SABATH. Oh, I think that is unfair to Chicago. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is a great many years since we regarded Boston as a town. It may be proper to regard Milwaukee and Chicago as such, but I do not think it is fair to regard Boston in that way.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, it may have been contemplated when these estimates were made that a public building could be constructed in Boston for $1,500,000. I have not been raised along lines where exquisite taste was practiced, but I do believe in harmony. I do believe in the Government constructing buildings that will harmonize with the surroundings. Oh, my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] shrivels up his face at my remark, but I know well enough what he would demand if the city of New York were involved.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I could not help smiling at the gentleman's statement, because there are to be no surroundings for this building. It is to be so high up in the air that it is to overtop by hundreds of feet all of the insignificant structures that will be strewn around at its base.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I know nothing at all about its immediate surroundings, but I do know that Boston is a city of very great importance, and I do know, as compared with other cities where public buildings are demanded and expenses incurred, that Boston ought to be well treated. I do know from observation that the estimate of the architect made at the time is not always capable of fulfillment. I do know that in a case at hand, in the little town where I live, where they estimated that $60,000 would be sufficient to construct a good building, I had to appeal to Congress a second time for the modest sum of twenty or thirty thousand dollars in addition. I thought $60,000 would be sufficient and so did the architect, and everybody thought that amount would be sufficient, but it would not build us a structure that would harmonize with the surroundings found in the little quaint, old-fashioned town in which I live. I do know that in this instance the Congress would not likely have agreed—certainly not if a protest had been made, and for one I would not—that the authorities should have the opportunity to run to this fund whenever they saw fit to take the money with which to pay the rent of quarters for the office force. It will be two or three years before this building will be constructed. Certainly the word "temporary" in the language in the bill did not intend to mean that for time without limit the money could be taken from the fund appropriated to pay the temporary expenses.

I do not think that this is an immodest demand. I think we ought to pass the bill reported by the committee. I only regret, let me say to my Democratic friends, that the caucus has willed that we shall not have at this time the opportunity of passing a bill to provide for public buildings generally which Members usually expect. I am not expecting any, of course. Nevertheless, if we can avoid the decree of the Democratic caucus I am one who is willing to undertake it, if it almost rips up the Treasury in the attempt.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, of course you can put up a building for almost any price you desire. You can put it up for 5 cents a cubic foot; you can put it up for 7 cents a cubic foot or for 10 cents a cubic foot, or up to 70 cents a cubic foot. It altogether depends upon what kind of a building you desire. The tendency of the citizens of the United States is toward more ornate buildings. Time was when we were all willing to live in log houses, glad to have a log house in which to live, but that time has gone by, and now everybody is seeking more comfort and better facilities and more durability and more art and more harmony, and there is no reason on earth why the Government of the United States should destroy the neighborhood in which it erects a public building.

Why should the Government of the United States destroy values by constructing cheap buildings when the people who live in the neighborhoods of those buildings are putting up good buildings themselves? The Government ought to set the pace for a high standard of construction. It ought to put in the most durable material that can be found. You can put up a building with an interior finish of pine or you can put in brass interior finish for your doors—oak, mahogany, bronze, or whatever you may wish to put in—but I maintain the most economical construction is the construction that costs the highest price when it is first erected, for it costs less to maintain and lasts longer, and it always looks well while it lasts. I say that it is false economy to put up a building for a small price, regardless of the character of its construction, simply because you have the cubic content in it to do the business. That kind of building is no longer erected anywhere. In every great State in the Union buildings are being put up now of the most palatial style, and they are being put up to attract the eye——

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Most assuredly.

Mr. SHERLEY. What do you mean by this kind of building?

Mr. MADDEN. The cheap building—with no regard for durability or style or artistic effect.

Mr. SHERLEY. They do not propose to change the kind of building. It is just a question of whether to expend $300,000 more for material.

Mr. MADDEN. That is exactly what I said. It is a question now whether you will be content with the cubical contents of the building regardless of the construction, whether it is constructed so as to be a permanent construction, whether you are to put up the character of construction that will be always in order, or whether you are to put up a flimsy character of building that will require vast repairs.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit again?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is no question, so far as the architect testified, as to the permanency of the building whether the upper part will be of brick or stone; they are going to have a steel frame for it.

Mr. MADDEN. I realize that; and while the brick construction of the exterior work would probably last as long as the interior workmanship would, yet it would not be in keeping with the conditions that ought to surround a great public building in a city like Boston.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman say, if he knows, how many public buildings there are in Chicago or New York which are built of stone, and I will ask him if it is not the rule that most of the large buildings are built two or three stories of stone and the rest of it of brick or of terra cotta, like the very handsome building that has just been put up opposite the Treasury Building—the Riggs Building, one of the handsomest buildings in Washington—which is built of tile.

Mr. MADDEN. I think a very large number of high-class buildings are being constructed of glazed terra cotta throughout the country, but very little brick is used for the exterior work. Glazed tile is used and a very high class of pressed brick. You can not used glazed brick successfully, because the glaze wears off; whereas if you use a durable material like marble or granite it stands forever. Its durability is unquestioned, but the action of the atmosphere works on the other material so that in a short time it is an eyesore, and such construction ought to be avoided as a policy of the United States Government. The farmers of the United States are putting up better buildings on their farms than they used to do. They are laying out lawns and planting trees and putting out flower beds They are not satisfied with the ordinary beauty that nature gives them any longer.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. And building good roads.

Mr. MADDEN. And, as my mud-road friend from Missouri says, they are wanting to build good roads out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. I want to ask the gentleman a question. I was in the employ of the State of Massachusetts under some of their architects some years ago, and I learned to entertain a very high respect for their capacity and their ability, and I think it due to that State and due to ourselves that we let them select the materials they want and the manner in which they want to erect this building, and I think that we are wasting the time of this House in talking about this matter any further.

Mr. CURLEY. I was going to say, some 60 years ago when the customhouse was erected at Boston it was granite, and that private parties who have since constructed buildings in that vicinity have felt that they were compelled in a measure to erect their buildings to conform in character of material to that used by the Government of the United States.

Now, as we have there a chamber of commerce building that represents an expenditure of one million and a half of dollars—a granite building; a stock exchange, built in the immediate vicinity, representing an expenditure of about a million dollars—a granite building; a customhouse and warehouse building, constructed of granite and some 1,500 feet long and about 400 feet wide and some 7 stories in height, would it not rather suggest a ridiculous proposition if we were to put up a brick building? Something akin to a man invited to address a public gathering appearing in evening dress and wearing canvas shoes.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, for example, here is what happens: A man may live in a country district and have a nice home, and he may feel a pride in keeping that home up. So he paints his house every year, and what happens? Everybody in the neighborhood that can raise the money paints his house. If this man lets his house run down, every other house runs down. If the Government of the United States in an impecunious attitude should refuse to appropriate a building merely because of the fact that it is to be built in Boston, it would make a great mistake. The Government ought to put up good buildings everywhere. Why, this is a matter that concerns the people of the whole United States. It is a matter that concerns everybody, wherever they may live. It is an encouragement to private capital to invest in better buildings. I remember the time in great cities when the people who were well to do were willing to live in houses built of common brick. As they got better off they put up pressed-brick fronts, and then they put pressed-brick sides on the buildings. And after awhile they wanted more ornate buildings, and they put in sawed-stone fronts, and held these fronts on the buildings by anchors. And when they got better off they wanted marble fronts, and put them in with blocks of brownstone. They are always doing something to beautify the cities in which they live.

A building of the kind mentioned in this bill ought to be a work of art, and the Government ought not under any circumstances to save $100,000 in a great building that should last for a quarter of a century.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If they built a substantial building even less ornate than the gentleman has in mind, would not cities in my district ask them to give them buildings where they have none?

Mr. MADDEN. I am in favor of giving the cities to which the gentleman refers buildings as well. I am not in favor of skimping in the construction of a great public building. It ought not to be so. It is not an extravagant price to pay for a building—$1,800,000—in a great city like Boston. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I come from a district in Nebraska where we would like to have some public buildings, and I can assure the gentleman that if any be granted he will not have to build any of them 400 feet in the air in order to have room for their construction. We have a good deal of space out there for public buildings, but when we presented our demand there was presented a caucus action of the majority as a plea in bar which said there should not be any public buildings granted at this session.

Now, I do not object to Boston any more than any other city. I have a very high opinion of Boston and the Bostonese. The facts are that old Massachusetts has a great record. I believe it held the record for the lowest rate of illiteracy in this Union until Nebraska wrested that record from her some 10 years ago. And for that reason we do not want to take any further advantage of Boston. They are trying to get it on the ground of a man who, in improvising Scripture, said, "Them as has, gits," and because they have had they expect to get more. I was somewhat interested in the picture of this projected building. It ought to be exhibited to this House so that we could all see it. I have grave suspicions about it. It looks as if they propose to cut the upper 400 feet from the Washington Monument and transport it to Boston and then make a customhouse out of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I want to say to the gentleman that if they take off the top 400 feet of the Washington Monument and transport it to Boston we would have a better-looking building than we shall have unless we get the money we are asking for.

Mr. SLOAN. I am rather interested in that. I was going to speak of the patriotism of old Boston. Just think of the people who are so anxious to pay customs duties as they enter the port of Boston that they are ready to climb 400 feet high to avoid smuggling. [Laughter.] To establish this I notice they dig a foundation 200 feet deep, and then to match the foundation and have something to hold it down they are to build a tower 400 feet above the earth. But, then, I think, perhaps the building would serve a better purpose in pointing the citizens of Boston the way to heaven than it would for the collection of revenue for the United States Government. It might be likened unto the Tower of Babel, but a confusion of tongues in Boston—perish the thought. [Laughter.]

Now, what I do object to is this, not that Boston must be favored or not favored, but that in her case there shall be a special dispensation. The Democratic caucus, which has assumed control of these matters, has said to all of us out on the bounding plains, "You can not have any public buildings this session." But they would say now, in case of a favorable vote on this bill, "We will grant a special dispensation to Boston." To that I am opposed, unless they will say that this Boston matter has been brought before the Democratic caucus, which is the final arbiter on this question. And if the caucus has granted it, I want them to see that it goes through. If it has not been granted let it not be further considered. If I am ruled by that body, I want to be ruled when it is in my favor as well as when it is against me.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SLOAN. I will answer it if I can.

Mr. PAYNE. If they should attach to this bill from one to half a dozen buildings for the gentleman's district in Nebraska, would it ease it up any or seem less like a special dispensation?

Mr. SLOAN. It would ease it up generally, and that would be the way to appeal to me. [Laughter.] And if the gentleman from New York has force enough to accomplish that, I would be glad to see him attach such an amendment. If you proceed to give a public building to every district that is entitled to it, I am inclined to think that this great tower would be erected in Boston, along with the other much-needed public buildings of the country.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman is climbing right onto the idea.

Mr. SLOAN. Oh, yes; I have been watching the course of the distinguished leaders on both sides of the House for many years. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman that I was told two or three years ago, about the time the tariff bill was passed, that if I would put on a certain amendment that would help this gentleman who spoke to me and a large class, there would be no doubt but that the bill in the next 60 days would be the most popular bill in the United States. He asserted that the people would say it was the best bill. I have no doubt if you could put a public building into every district in the country the bill by which you accomplished that result would be a popular bill.

Mr. SLOAN. But the gentleman did not make that amendment?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman did not.

Mr. SLOAN. I suppose there was a spasm of virtue then.

Mr. PAYNE. No. If the gentleman will stay here longer, he will notice other spasms of virtue of the same kind.

Mr. SLOAN. I wondered at the modesty with which this special instance was suggested.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to his colleague?

Mr. SLOAN. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman has suggested that this tower is to be 400 feet high. Is that it?

Mr. SLOAN. That is what they say.

Mr. NORRIS. Was it to point the way to heaven to the Bostonians?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the gentleman to say also that if the cellar is 200 feet deep there would be danger that they would go the other way. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. I will say to the gentleman that I am in favor of serving both classes and all classes in this matter of public buildings and other matters as the foundation and tower would lead Bostonians. They have travelers both ways—more going up than going down—hence difference in height of tower and depth of foundation.

Mr. NORRIS. Touching the location of the building, I fear, from the very fact that the tower is made higher than the cellar is deep, the natural inclination of the Bostonians is to go down rather than up.

Mr. SLOAN. I think the gentleman understands the bean eaters fully and precisely. [Applause.] [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there are some important facts about this building that I think should be called to the attention of the House. Gentlemen speak about the taking of $300,000 from the authorization as if that had been done after the building had been planned, and in that way those in charge of the construction of the building embarrassed. The fact is that after the authorization of $1,800,000 was made, with a provision for the payment of certain expenses therefrom, the Treasury Department estimated that $300,000 would be required to pay the rentals and other expenses incident to providing for the public business outside of the building during the construction of this new building. It fixed $1,500,000 as the limit within which the building should be designed. The architect was notified to plan a building which would cost not to exceed $1,500,000.

It appears from his statement before the Committee on Appropriations that he was unable to determine why he should not have the $1,800,000, and he planned a building to cost $1,800,000.

In inviting bids for the construction of this building, there was done what is done as to every building advertised for construction by the United States. A number of alternate propositions were outlined in the plans and specifications, and the advertisement required the submission of offers not only upon a definite plan which fixed the features, but provided for the substitution of certain things in case they were determined to be desirable and necessary to bring the building within the limit fixed, and the bids had to be submitted in that way.

By the substitution of certain alternates a building can be constructed giving the same amount of floor space as in the original design, but it will not be as ornamental as if the additional $327,000 were expended.

I call attention to the fact that it requires, not the amount which was set forth, $350,000 additional, but $327,000; and the additional amount up to $350,000, spoken of by the architect, would cover the additional compensation to which the architect would be entitled if, under his contract of 6 per cent of the cost, if I remember correctly, he can obtain 6 per cent upon this additional $327,000.

One of the things that it would be necessary to substitute would be brick in place of granite, the tower which can be seen in the picture before the committee to be faced with brick instead of granite. The architect seemed to imagine that it would be a great crime upon the æsthetic taste of the people of Boston to face this tower with brick. To hear his statement one would imagine that an unsightly, common, red brick tower was contemplated, but after he had been questioned somewhat it turned out that instead of unsightly, common, ordinary, red brick this tower would be faced with handsome, light, pressed brick, and above the tenth story it would require an expert to tell whether it were faced with brick or with granite or some other stone.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks the Washington Monument, if made of the nice pressed brick he talks about, would be as pleasing and as majestic and as harmonious as it is now, made of granite?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that if the Washington Monument had been built of a light-colored pressed brick, and that fact was stated to myself or to the gentleman from Massachusetts, we would have marveled all the more at the remarkable engineering skill that made possible the construction of that pile of brick, rather than of the massive stones out of which it is constructed. So far as its being pleasing to the eye is concerned, I imagine that if it were faced with light pressed brick or some other material as is the new building which takes the place of the old Riggs House in this city, it would be much more attractive and pleasing to the eye than the present uneven, discolored, unattractive facing which many of the stones in the Monument present. But to come to the substitution of the pressed brick in this tower. This Boston architect, Mr. Peabody, was greatly shocked that the people of Boston should have thrust up into the air nearly 500 feet this ugly, unsightly, ungainly tower of pressed brick. It would be out of place with the surroundings, so inconsistent with the architecture in the vicinity, and so repellent to the eyes of those coming to the shores of this country for the first time by the way of the magnificent harbor of Boston, that it would be a great injustice, not only to the people of this country but to those of other climes who seek a refuge here through Boston.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, but two or three weeks earlier a brick tower did not seem to be such an architectural monstrosity to the supervising architect when before the committee. He desired to be permitted to erect a pressed-brick tower 275 feet high in the city of New York. It was to be erected on what is known as the new barge office, a building which, I believe, is to cost $500,000. It was to be a Venetian structure, rearing its stately form at the Battery, where it would be the cynosure of all those entering the country through New York Harbor, a thing of beauty and a joy forever. [Laughter.] And yet in my innocence, in my ignorance of architectural niceties, I inquired of the supervising architect if he did not think it would impair the artistic surroundings of the city of New York by putting up this brick tower right at the Battery, and he said, on the contrary, it would add very largely to the attractiveness of the city. [Laughter.] But two or three weeks later, when it was suggested that this tower in Boston should be faced with the same kind of material instead of granite, the artistic sensibilities of the architect in charge were immeasurably shocked that such an outrage should be committed on the people of that highly sensitive community. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. Does not the gentleman think that that brick tower in New York would be more appropriate if constructed of gold bricks?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would be not only more appropriate, but the only thing that could properly be constructed there if the residents of Pittsburgh continue to go to New York in such numbers as they have in recent time and permanently reside there.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Does not the gentleman think that if the citizens of New York had returned to them all the gold bricks that have been purchased from them by gentlemen from Pennsylvania they might be able to erect a gold-brick tower there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; I think not. We have a very limited supply of gold bricks. And besides, I never worried very much about those who burn their fingers in purchasing gold bricks.

But to come back to Boston and this public building. To prevent the artistic sensibilities of the people of Boston from being shocked by using brick instead of granite will cost just $96,000. I might not object to the expenditure of this money if I thought the building would be a permanent benefit to the people of Boston or to the country. But this tower is some 18 stories in height; the lower part of the building, the old customhouse, I am informed, will be so cut up that it will be practically of no benefit whatever. There will be corridors, hallways, passageways, and practically no office space. This tower is 60 feet by 70 feet, without sufficient room on any one floor for any one division of any department of the Government that is to be accommodated in it. After it is finished it will be more expensive and uneconomical to conduct the public business in that building than in any other building that could possibly be designed. Within 10 years not only the people of Boston but the United States officials will be clamoring to have it abandoned and a decent, well-fitted, respectable building constructed in the city of Boston for the transaction of the public business under conditions which should exist where public business is transacted.

This $300,000 is a pure waste of public money. This is not a monumental building to be used for a great many years for the accommodation of the public business in the city of Boston. It will be inadequate. It will be insufficient. It will cost much more to conduct the public business in this building than in a building properly constructed, and from the investigation which I have made it would be much better if, instead of continuing this building, we were to pay a reasonable price to the contractors to have the existing contracts canceled and proceed to obtain an adequate site and plan and authorize a decent and fitting building.

I now desire to call attention to some other things which will be necessary. If this increased limit is not granted, it will be necessary, instead of having copper windows, to substitute windows of some other metal, and the difference in the cost between copper windows and metal windows other than copper is $36,750. I do not know how many public buildings have copper windows. There are none in the Capitol. There are none in our office buildings, and they are very rare even in Washington; but in artistic Boston these windows must be of copper.

Then to make some slight changes in the sloping roof, to substitute a steel frame and copper roof for the sloping stone roof of the tower, and instead of having the tower faced with stone, having it faced with copper, somewhat similar to the dome of the Congressional Library, which, of course, is not to be thought of in connection with this building, would make a difference of $16,900. To have the inside of the windows of some other metal than copper, not even of wood, would make a difference of $3,000. Then there are doors of peculiar design, doors opening in the offices from the corridors on all of these floors, and from one room into another, and if we do not insist that they have this peculiar design of door, but have other doors, there will be a saving of $4,000. In this 18-story tower it may be necessary to have these unique and unusual doors in artistic Boston.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. CURLEY. I would ask the gentleman how much might be saved if they had no doors and no windows in the building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I see no pertinency in that question. Suppose this architect, with these extravagant notions, had asked us to gild the doors, would the gentleman have thought it pertinent to have suggested that instead of having gilded doors they should have no doors? I do not know a public building in the city of Washington that has copper windows. I know of a great many public buildings in other cities, and I know a great many very magnificent buildings, and I do not know of many, if any, which have windows of copper—few of them of any kind of metal. They are now introducing metal as a prevention from fire loss; but why is it necessary to add $41,000 to the cost of this building simply to have the windows and the interior of the windows of copper? There are many other metals that might be used without this extravagant outlay. Perhaps the gentleman thinks it is necessary in Boston to have copper windows so that when the ordinary passer-by on the street, going home from his daily toil, looks up at the eighteenth story window and sees it open his artistic sensibilities will not be shocked by the realization that instead of having a copper window open it is only a metal window. To save the people of Boston from this outrage perhaps it is proper to expend $40,000 and incidentally pay to the architect $2,400 additional as the result of having the copper windows substituted.

If we omit the granite-carving allowance there will be a saving of $30,000 more. There is certain carving on the granite that perhaps would be permitted in Boston which would not be permitted elsewhere. Thirty thousand dollars for carving for æsthetic Boston!

Omit the sculpture allowance and there is a saving of $25,000. If we are to have heroic statues of great men, either of the past or of modern times, I think if this bill goes through they should be statues in marble of heroic size of the present delegation in Congress from the city of Boston. [Laughter.] Twenty-five thousand dollars would not be too much with which to commemorate their memory in such a way, and I am not certain that I would not be willing to advocate an appropriation of $25,000 if I were certain that the gentlemen from Massachusetts—Mr. CURLEY, Mr. PETERS, and Mr. MURRAY, with their allies on the other side—would stand and look down as graven images upon the people of Boston passing to and fro in order that they might say, "This is the delegation that prevented our æsthetic sensibilities from being shocked by the substitution of metal for copper windows." [Laughter.]

That would be worth the money, assuredly it would be worth the expenditure; and if we could so modify this bill as to insure such works of arts—it would perhaps necessitate the approval of the Fine Arts Commission—I perhaps would be glad to vote for it. [Laughter.] Here is another item:

Substitute base for wainscot in the corridors and connecting stairs from fourth to eighteenth stories, $8,000.

In this Capitol we have a marble base all through the halls and corridors and above it is a plastered wall, but in this building they want a wainscoting about 5½ feet of marble from the fourth to the eighteenth story. Nobody will ever walk a single flight of those stairs unless the elevators are out of commission and the safety of those in the building depends upon their walking. If anybody employed by the Government walked down from the eighteenth floor of that building, either in his own time or the Government's time, it would be most extraordinary.

Mr. CURLEY. Or if they walked up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I never suggested walking up, I talked about walking down, and yet it makes a difference of $8,000, whether that wainscoting is placed there or whether it is finished as any building in Washington where we have just a marble base. "Omit marble panels for sculpture in the rotunda and leave the recesses plastered in such manner that marble can be placed later, $3,500. Omit the marbles of the walls of the rotunda, except bases, shafts, and caps of columns from a point 18 feet above the rotunda floor, and substitute plaster, $1,000." That is for the rotunda of the building to have a marble finish to a point 18 feet above the floor and then above that 18 feet from the floor, instead of having marble, have it plastered as the Rotunda of this Capitol happens to be. By so doing $11,000 would be saved, but in this rotunda the architect desires to have the entire rotunda, sides and walls, covered with marble. If we simply take and plaster it from a point 18 feet from the floor to the top of the dome it makes a difference of $11,000. To make the dome of this rotunda of copper instead of marble would save $10,000. "Guarantee the waterproofing, using any plan that will do the work properly," will result in a saving of $4,000.

One method of waterproofing was specified, and yet to permit the use of any other method, with the guaranty that the building will be waterproof, will save $4,000. Why pay for some patented process, which is an additional bonus, if the waterproofing can be guaranteed by the use of some other process?

"To make the posts, rails, balustrades of all unimportant stairs plain, top and bottom rails to be plain, $7,000."

That foots up a total of $327,000, with the omission of one or two trifling elements. The purpose of this bill is to prevent the substitution of the matters to which I have called attention for the other materials, and to do so $327,000 must be added to the present cost, and for architect's fee an additional sum of $18,000. Such will be the result of the passing of this bill permitting the inclusion of these particular items. Do not forget it.

Mr. BUTLER. Architect's fee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; that has not been mentioned yet.

Mr. BUTLER. Not the Supervising Architect?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This building is being built under the Tarsney Act. A Boston firm of architects have this particular work.

Mr. BURLESON. Peabody & Co.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Peabody & Co. Six per cent on $1,500,000 starts the fee. That is what they will receive, $90,000; and if the privilege of substituting the particular things which I have pointed out as desired be substituted we will pay them an additional $18,000. I have stated the facts in this case. This building was placed with these architects with instructions to design a building to cost $1,500,000. They deliberately designed a building to cost $1,800,000. Now, which is to prevail, Congress or the architect, who is to get a financial benefit from the designing of the building in excess of the limit fixed by Congress? The public service will not be affected by not substituting these particular things. Boston will not be injured—Boston will be benefited—because the sooner this building is destroyed after it is finished the better Boston will be, both from the standpoint of artistic features and from the standpoint of the public service.

We might just as well look at it frankly. The building is not a suitable building nor a fit building for the transaction of public business, and Boston should not have it forced upon it. A city like Boston is entitled to a suitable public building. By taking an old customhouse, using it as a base to erect upon it a tower 70 by 60 feet, nearly 500 feet in the air, for the transaction of the public business in a proper and efficient manner will not result satisfactorily. It is the most ridiculous proposition that has ever been suggested.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. As we are likely to have a long day to-morrow, I thought perhaps the gentleman would yield the floor to some one to move to rise.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have about finished.

Mr. MANN. I meant, of course, temporarily.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall finish in a moment. I have practically finished all I have to say. I thought these facts should be submitted to this committee.

The Committee on Appropriations gave the architect an opportunity to present his views about this building. The committee, or many of the members, was convinced that it would not only be an injustice to the United States, but it would be a wrong to Boston to have held over them this fact that they got this $300,000 additional for this building, when the officials of the Government know now that the building will not be adequate. Under the circumstances I do not believe it should expend this money upon this architectural monstrosity. Boston deserves better. The business of the Federal Government there is extensive and important. There is needed suitable and ample accommodations for its transaction. It should be carried on in a building of such character as will enable it to be efficiently and economically done. This building is neither suitable nor adequate. Money should not be wasted upon it. Nothing should be done which will prevent this community from obtaining such accommodations for the business of the Federal Government as are imperatively required, will be persistently demanded, and to which the city and Government are entitled.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 40 minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to some gentleman in charge to move to rise.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Let us get a vote on this and adjourn.

Mr. MURRAY. My colleague Mr. PETERS, who has been in charge of the matter during most of the afternoon, has stepped out, but I do not believe it is his desire, or the desire of anyone of us who is in favor of the bill, to prolong the debate. We are perfectly willing to take the vote on the bill now or at any other time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I prefer to submit my remarks on the bill further and prefer to have a larger audience present than there is now. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

Mr. MANN. Then I shall make a point of order that there is no quorum present. I thought the gentlemen wanted to do business, but if they do not——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes a point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] if he will be willing to have the previous question ordered, so that the vote may be taken on the bill immediately——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I stated I had 40 minutes remaining to me, and I desire to consume some time, and I am not prepared to go on to-night.

The CHAIRMAN (after counting). Sixty-seven Members are present, no quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MANN. It will take a roll call on the motion to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state it was just a call of the roll in order to determine the presence of a quorum.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of no quorum if an agreement is reached as to when a vote may be taken on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS] that a point of no quorum has been made and no quorum has been ascertained. There is nothing to be done but to rise. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded with the calling of the roll.

Mr. MANN. A motion was pending to rise. It does not require a quorum to rise, and I ask for a vote on the motion to rise.

Mr. FOSTER. I think, Mr. Chairman, the Chair decided that the committee concluded to rise.

Mr. BUTLER. He did; but the division was asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS] asked for a division, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made a point of no quorum. The ayes have it, and the committee decides to rise.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 24227) to amend section 11 of an act entitled "An act to grant additional authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out certain provisions of the public-buildings act, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1909, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania, for one week, on account of death of a relative.

To Representatives WATKINS, ANTHONY, CONRY, HUGHES of Georgia, MCKELLAR, PRINCE, and AMES, for three days, on account of visiting West Point as members of the Board of Visitors.

To Mr. BARTHOLDT, for two weeks, on account of important business.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 25102) to amend section 4347 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act of February, 1898, so as to permit foreign vessels to engage in transportation of merchandise between the ports of the United States, Territories, and insular possessions through the Panama Canal, and the same was referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R.

25109) providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees, and the same was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, June 6, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of James Deatherage, administrator of J. A. J. Rooker, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 809); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting estimate of appropriation for employing temporary clerks for the General Land Office (H. Doc. No. 810); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Attorney General submitting estimate of appropriation to pay Frank N. Allen for copying correspondence for use of United States district attorney, southern district of New York (H. Doc. No. 811); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting list of claims paid by disbursing officer of the Interior Department, which have been or will be disallowed, and requesting authority to credit same (H. Doc. No. 812); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 6, 1912.

The Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, Thou art our Shepherd. Though Thou causest us to walk through the valley of the shadow of death, we will fear no evil. Thou art, O God, still with us. The rod of Thy faithfulness and the staff of Thy providence, they comfort us. Make us, we humbly pray Thee, to rest in the green pastures of Thy tender mercies and lead us beside the still waters of Thy heavenly grace. Grant that goodness and mercy may follow us all the days of our life and that we may dwell in the house of Thy presence forever.

Even so, our Father, hear and bless us, as we stand before Thee with bowed heads and with saddened hearts. We know that the way of man is not in himself alone and that it is not in us who walk to direct our steps. We humbly confess our dependence upon Thee. It is Thou who hast made us, and not we ourselves. It is Thou who holdest us in life and who orderest all our steps. Therefore do we put our trust in Thee. We commend to Thy care the soul of him whom Thou hast called from our presence. Be with those, we pray Thee, to whom this sorrow is most near and most sore. Comfort them as Thou alone canst comfort Thy children. Our heart and our flesh faileth, but Thou, O God, art our strength and our portion for evermore.

And unto Thee, our Father, who has loved us with an everlasting love and has given us comfort and good hope through the Gospel, unto Thee, who art our God and our Savior, be all glory now and for evermore.

In the name of Him who abolished death and brought life and immortality to light, hear our prayer. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. NEWLANDS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR GEORGE S. NIXON.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it is my sad duty to announce to the Senate the death of my colleague, the Hon. GEORGE S. NIXON, held in high esteem and affectionate regard by this body. His death occurred at Washington on the 5th day of June, 1912, at 9.55 p. m., after a painful illness following a surgical operation. At some future day I shall propose that the business of the Senate be suspended for the purpose of paying a fitting tribute to his memory.

I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask for their present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Nevada.

The Secretary read the resolutions (S. Res. 333), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. GEORGE S. NIXON, late a Senator from the State of Nevada.

Resolved, That a committee of 12 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect, his remains be removed from Washington to Reno, Nev., for burial, in charge of the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, attended by the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

The resolutions were considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed as the committee, under the second resolution, Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. BAILEY, Mr. WORKS, Mr. HEYBURN, Mr. BROWN, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. OLIVER, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. FALL, and Mr. ASHURST.

Mr. NEWLANDS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 332), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of the late Senator GEORGE STUART NIXON, from the State of Nevada, vouchers for the same to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported favorably without amendment the foregoing resolution, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the funeral services of the distinguished Senator will be held at 4 o'clock this afternoon at the residence, Belvoir, Woodley Lane, near the Episcopal Cathedral, and that the Sergeant at Arms will provide conveyances for Senators.

As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 7, 1912, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 6, 1912.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, renew our faith and confidence in Thee; continue Thy favors unto us; quicken all our faculties and make us strong to do Thy will that we may be faithful servants unto Thee and unto our fellow men. Let Thy blessing be upon the stricken wife and son of the Senator who has been called suddenly to the higher life, that they may put their trust in the God of the living and the dead, whose mercy is from everlasting to everlasting. Prepare us for whatever awaits us in the dispensation of Thy providence, and Thine be the praise, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. Foss, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of the death of his father.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] use some time. We have used some excess of time on our side.

Mr. CANNON. How does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has used 2 hours and 45 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois has used 2 hours and 30 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] 20 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a bill which I have introduced, being House bill 16844.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16844) prohibiting fraud upon the public by requiring manufacturers to place their own names upon manufactured articles.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. The provisions of this act shall apply to any person, firm, company, or corporation engaged in the production or manufacture of any article or commodity that enters into interstate or foreign commerce.

"It shall be unlawful for any such person, firm, company, or corporation to place upon the market for interstate or foreign commerce any product or products of manufacture assembled and ready for use without printing, embossing, or stenciling the name and address of the manufacturer upon such article or commodity: Provided, That in case it is impracticable to place such name and address on the article it shall be placed on the wrapper or package containing it.

"It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, company, or corporation to erase or change the name of the manufacturer or manufacturers of any article entering into interstate and foreign commerce mentioned in this act.

"Any person or persons, firm, company, or corporation offering for sale or rent, or otherwise disposing of any property intended for interstate or foreign commerce shall furnish therewith the name and address of the manufacturer or manufacturers of said commodity or article: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to prohibit such manufacturing firms placing any other name, as dealers, upon articles of manufacture in addition to the name of the manufacturer.

"Any person, firm, company, or corporation violating the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and fined in the sum of not exceeding $1,000, or imprisoned for a period of not exceeding six months, or both such fine and imprisonment, as the court may direct."

SEC. 2. That this act shall be in effect from and after six months after its passage.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill as read differs in some minor particulars from the bill as introduced and as discussed in the trade and manufacturers' journals throughout the country. I have amended the provisions of the bill by providing that only the finished product shall require the name of the manufacturer, making it unnecessary to place the name on the unassembled parts of a manufactured article.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. Is this the bill introduced by the gentleman, providing for the names of manufacturers to be placed on products?

Mr. CAMPBELL. This is the bill.

Mr. DALZELL. Has it been reported by any committee?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It has not.

I have also amended the bill by providing that it shall go into effect six months after its passage. The effect of this bill will be to abolish the sweatshop; it will stop the sale of prison-made goods in competition with the products of honest industry; and it will insure a higher grade of every product of manufacture that to-day does not bear the name of the manufacturer, in this way giving to the consumer articles that are worth taking home. It will aid in promoting health by preventing wearing apparel, food products, and tobacco and cigars from being made under the insanitary and diseased conditions of the sweatshop. It will aid laborers in every branch of industry and insure to the people wholesome and clean food products and clean and durable clothing. The whole public will be benefited by the law, and only a few who are specially interested and whose welfare should not be the sole concern of the lawmaker will be immediately injured by it, and in the end they will be benefited by it.

Many Members of the House and Senate have been made to fear the general effects of this bill. I do not think I exaggerate it when I say that almost every Member has either spoken to me personally or referred to me letters from his constituents with reference to the proposed law. It has been discussed and criticized in the manufacturers' and trade journals throughout the country. Objection to it comes from some manufacturers, jobbers, and a few retailers whose business, it is claimed, would be injured by its provisions. I do not take issue with those interests. I simply say that I am concerned in the welfare of the general public, and that no man or concern has a right to defraud the public. The object of this bill is to stop the kind of fraud that has been perpetrated from year to year by unscrupulous manufacturers.

I have hundreds of comments clipped from trade and manufacturers' journals. If it were practicable to do so, I would read them all, knowing that the objections they make to the bill are the best arguments in its support. Let me give a few brief extracts:

Congressman CAMPBELL'S bill, if adopted into law, would cause serious trouble to the jobber and the middleman, especially. It would tend to eliminate the jobber, as nothing would prevent the manufacturers selling their wares direct to the retailers or the consumers.

The Campbell bill is inimicable to the best interests of the great majority of the manufacturers, wholesalers, and jobbers. * * * Meanwhile, the opposition to the bill is only beginning.

We are glad to print, as we do elsewhere in this issue, criticisms of the Campbell bill of some of the leading jobbing houses.

Mr. Chairman, the objections come from these special interests, and in many cases are very bitter.

I have been told that if I pushed this bill the interests opposing it will defeat me in my district. My reply is, "I am pushing the bill."

The manufacturers who have women's and children's and other clothes made under the most insanitary, sweatshop conditions are opposed to the bill. Every dealer who sells prison-made goods to an unsuspecting public is opposed to the bill. Every unscrupulous manufacturer who makes fair-looking but shoddy goods to be used at so-called bankrupt, closing-out, and fire sales is opposed to the bill. Every manufacturer who makes fair-looking but, in fact, only sham imitations of similar articles for mail-order houses is opposed to the bill. Every manufacturer who makes, without putting his name on his product, cheap and inferior shoes, harness, buggies, organs, pianos, clothing, and food products, all having the outward appearance of being as good as any similar articles, is opposed to the bill.

In fact, every manufacturer and every jobber interested in deceiving and defrauding the public and getting money from the people for a thing that is worthless, is opposed to the bill, and all because it is known to these interests that requiring the manufacturer to place his name upon the articles he produces will insure to the public a better article and protect the people against the frauds now perpetrated upon them.

Honest manufacturers and honest jobbers and dealers of all kinds will not be hurt and are not opposing the bill. Why should any manufacturer be permitted to place upon the market an article so inferior that he would not put his name upon it? No country permits such frauds as are perpetrated on the American public through the use of inferior products of unknown manufacturers.

This bill should have, and I believe will have, the support of every Member of Congress and of the general public as soon as its purposes and effects are known. In all essential principles it is like the pure food and drug law and will be as beneficial to the people.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am very much interested in the gentleman's remarks. I will ask him if the chief advantage of his bill and its chief purpose is to provide a means and instrumentality by which we may trace to its origin a dishonest product?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is exactly the purpose, and it has the further purpose of giving an opportunity to examine the factory to see whether or not it is a sweatshop and whether it is sanitary or not.

Mr. ADAMSON. That would serve the other idea, of protecting the people against the further production of such articles.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It would.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will ask the gentleman if he believes the provisions of his bill would prove effective for that purpose?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think so, just as the pure-food law has been becoming from year to year more and more effective and beneficial to the public.

When understood, after full discussion by that portion of the press that is not specially interested in any one particular industry, and that represents the whole people, I believe this bill, like the pure-food law, will have the general support of the country and of the Members of both branches of Congress.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, there is one other question I would like to ask the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. There are a great many classes of goods used in one shape which are retailed, of course, in quite a different shape and form. There are various kinds of cloths and fabrics and a great many other things, and the gentleman will catch my idea without specific mention. I would like to ask him how the provisions of his bill would be useful to the retail trade and how they could be made so. If you stamp the entire bolt of cloth, how would that prove efficacious to prevent the retailer being swindled?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The bolt of cloth to-day is stamped; but what I want to stamp is the undergarment the child wears. I want to know who makes it and the shirtwaist the mother wears. The wearer has a right to know the conditions under which garments are made. Who has made the suit of clothes and under what conditions was it made; is the wearer sure that it was not made by some one afflicted with a communicable disease; was it made under such conditions as would justify anyone in wearing the clothes; was the cigar made under conditions that would justify anybody in smoking it; was the package of tobacco put up by a concern and under conditions that would justify anybody in using it; was the food product prepared ready for use under sanitary conditions.

Mr. ADAMSON. The material thing I am interested in—and the gentleman knows that I am interested concerning it——

Mr. CAMPBELL. The bill is before the gentleman's committee, and I am sure he is interested.

Mr. ADAMSON. As I say, what I am interested in is how he can frame the bill so that it will be effective in the retail trade, protect the consumer without unduly embarrassing or hampering the honest producers and the honest traders. Of course neither of us want to protect any other sort.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The provisions of the bill as it now reads apply to the finished product ready for use, as I have indicated, and I believe will injure no one who is honest with the public.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. How will the stamping of the name of the manufacturer upon the product indicate the conditions under which the product was put up, as the gentleman has suggested, whether under healthy conditions, and not under conditions involving communicable diseases that the gentleman has mentioned, or anything of that sort, unless the General Government is to supervise all manufacturing establishments?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The General Government and the State governments are now extending their influence over factories, and there is assembled in the city to-day representatives of factory inspectors. There is no way of inspecting unknown sweatshops that make certain goods——

Mr. MANN. How would stamping the name on these goods do any good unless they are inspected and stamped by the Government inspector?

Mr. CAMPBELL. My view is that no manufacturer will place upon the market in an open field of fair competition either a shoddy article or one that is known to have been made under insanitary conditions or in prison, and it may become necessary to inspect and stamp such mixed products as food and clothing, as is done now with packing-house products.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will.

Mr. AKIN of New York. In my district there is a factory where they manufacture covers for brooms. These covers are made out of very flimsy material, and they sell for in the neighborhood of $3 a thousand. How could you arrange it so that they could be stamped?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is a mere detail. I am now discussing the general purposes of the bill.

I have been asked a thousand questions in regard to this matter; for instance, how I would stamp a diamond ring, and all sorts of questions, some of them relevant, some of them raising a real important question, and others raising absolutely absurd questions. The people and concerns I am after are those who prepare food, clothes, and furnish products to the people generally of a character that ought to be what they purport to be.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Does the gentleman's bill apply to those people and nobody else?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The provisions of the bill apply to the products of manufacture.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am interested in the gentleman's remarks, and, like every other Member of Congress, I suppose, I have been receiving a great many letters in regard to the bill. I want to ask the gentleman in regard to one of the objections which strikes me the most forcibly, and that is the application of the bill to the woven fabric. Take the cotton fabric. It has to pass through two or three factories; one may spin the yarn, another may weave the cloth, another dye the cloth, and the point is made that this will cause confusion; in other words, what manufacturer's name will be stamped on the cloth?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The manufacturer or person that uses the cloth in making a finished product; who uses the cloth as lining or as any finished product ready for the use of the people.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But the gentleman's bill, it seems to me, at least the copy I saw, leaves the matter somewhat in doubt as to what would be the manufacture.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think as the bill was read this morning it obviates the objection made by those who have protested to the gentleman, inasmuch as it refers to the assembled products in an article ready for use.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman has changed his bill from its original form?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; in that particular.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I was about to ask the gentleman if he did not think it would be practicable here to narrow the scope of his bill so as to obviate the suggestions—several of them, at least—made on the line of that of the gentleman from Tennessee, and make it specify more nearly the people he is after.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I shall be very glad to have the cooperation of the gentleman from Georgia to that end.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman think it can be done?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think it can be done. I am discussing the general principle now that I think should be the adopted policy of this country. I undertook this work several years ago and prepared this bill and have spent a great deal of time in correspondence concerning it and in explaining it. My desire is to give the people better products for the money they pay out when they buy what they want. I am not particular as to the terms of the bill if they will accomplish my purpose.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. I have had some objections from my district.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. BOWMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has considered if he could include in his bill some provision that would protect the State that uses the right sort of labor in its factories, that affords protection to women and children, and whether he could protect one State which was giving a proper protection in that way from a State that was not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. All States will have to be included within the provisions of the bill, or any other bill of like character. We can not make it apply to Kansas and Georgia and leave out Pennsylvania.

I have no doubt that some industries will have to readjust their methods of doing business, and that is the purpose of the bill. I have taken the matter up with a view of getting the subject generally before the country for further discussion. I have no doubt that the bill will receive the approval of the people generally and be approved by Congress when its purposes are generally known. The subject is of the greatest possible importance. [Applause.]

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to present an argument in support of bill H. R. 23465, introduced by me, to amend section 162 of the judicial code of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. L., 1139).

THE PRESENT LAW.

Section 162 of the Judicial Code, which this bill proposes to amend, gives jurisdiction to the Court of Claims over claims under the captured and abandoned property act where the property was taken after June 1, 1865. These are commonly known as the cotton claims.

THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The bill I have introduced is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 23465) to amend section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 162. The Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction of any claim therefor filed prior to January 1, 1915, of those whose property was taken subsequent to June 1, 1865, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863, entitled 'An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States,' and acts amendatory thereof, where the property so taken was sold and the net proceeds thereof were placed in the Treasury of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall return said net proceeds to the owners thereof, on the judgment of said court, and full jurisdiction is given to said court to adjudge said claims, any statutes of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That no allegation or proof of loyalty shall be required in the presentation or adjudication of such claims: Provided further, That judgment hereunder shall not be denied by reason of any bill of sale or other conveyance of such property to the Confederate Government, in consideration of securities of said Government, unless accompanied or followed by actual delivery of such property: And provided further, That all judgments and payments hereunder shall be free from claims of assignees in bankruptcy or insolvency of the original owner of said claims."

This bill proposes to amend section 162 of the Judicial Code by the addition of three provisos, as follows:

1. That no allegation or proof of loyalty shall be required in the presentation or adjudication of such claims.

2. That judgment thereunder shall not be denied by reason of any bill of sale or other conveyance of such property to the Confederate Government, in consideration of securities of said Government, unless accompanied or followed by actual delivery of such property.

3. That all judgments and payments thereunder shall be free from claims of assignees in bankruptcy or insolvency of the original owner of said claims.

LOYALTY.

The first, dispensing with proof of loyalty, is already embraced in the bill H. R. 16314, introduced by Mr. WATKINS and reported by him from the Committee on Revision of the Laws (H. Rept. 224) of the present session. In that report it is said:

It was evidently the intention of Congress to allow this money to be paid to the claimants from whom the property was taken after June 1, 1865 (after the cessation of hostilities), without the proof of loyalty; but as section 159 of the act approved March 3, 1911, requires such allegation and proof, a conflict of opinion has arisen as to the interpretation of the law upon this point, and it is to settle this question that this bill is presented.

The report is right in treating this proviso as intending to remove a question and not to change the law. In Padelford v. United States (9 Wall., 531), United States v. Klein (13 Wall., 128), Armstrong v. United States (13 Wall., 154), and Pargoud v. United States (13 Wall., 156), the Supreme Court considered similar provisions arising under the acts of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. L., 767), and March 12, 1863 (sec. 3, 12 Stat. L., 820), requiring proof of loyalty, and declared that the general amnesty proclamation of the President of 1865, 1867, and 1868 (13 Stat. L., 758; 15 Stat. L., 699, 702, 711)— relieve claimants of captured and abandoned property from proof of adhesion to the United States during the late Civil War.

It is not to be contemplated that a defense should now be revived which was formally buried over 40 years ago by the Supreme Court. But since it has occasionally been suggested that such a defense may be asserted, it is deemed right to dispose of it in advance by legislation.

CONFEDERATE TITLE.

When this bill was passed it was believed that relief would be given to a large number of persons whose cotton had been taken after June 1, 1865, and whose claims were scheduled in Senate Executive Document No. 23, Forty-third Congress, second session. It appeared from the schedules in this document that this cotton had been taken by various agents of the United States Treasury after the actual close of the war, and that the net proceeds were in the Treasury. Petitions were consequently filed in the Court of Claims in a large number of these claims.

THE FACTS.

The records of the Treasury Department were furnished to the court upon its order and show that the planters from whom this cotton was taken had in nearly every instance sold cotton to the Confederate Government in 1862 or 1863, and received in exchange Confederate bonds, and that they had executed bills of sale for the cotton, agreeing to hold it in their possession until called for by the Confederate secretary of the treasury. It was never called for, but remained in their possession until Lee's surrender, as did also the bonds. In July, August, and September, 1865, after the actual close of the war, although technically it did not end until August 20, 1866 (United States v. Anderson, 9 Wall., 71), United States agents were sent to the various plantations to collect the cotton which had been the subject of such sales. The Confederate cotton records were then held by the United States and were used to trace the cotton. The major part of such cotton was found on the plantations and was taken by the United States agents. It was sent to New York and sold and its proceeds are in the Treasury, as shown by the document already cited.

A part of the cotton so sold had been destroyed by fire or otherwise; a part had possibly disappeared amid the terrific hostilities existing. On many plantations there was other cotton which had not been the subject of such transactions. The United States Treasury agents made little discrimination. They had the Confederate record showing a transaction of a named planter with the Confederate Government for a given number of bales. If they found that number of bales on his premises they seized it without regard to its identity, and it is apparent from the evidence still available that in many cases they took much additional cotton not comprised in the Confederate bills of sale. If the cotton described in them was not on the premises they took other cotton in the possession of the same planter.

The Confederate bonds which the planters had received had little market value when received and less the longer they were retained. They were, for patriotic reasons, almost always held in the possession of the planters until the close of the war, when they became valueless. The planter thus received nothing of value from the Confederate Government as a consideration for the sale. He received only a promise to pay, which was rendered worthless by the insolvency of the Confederacy.

It is the purpose of my bill to declare that the so-called sale of cotton to the Confederate Government shall not be a defense to a claim for its net proceeds in the Treasury, where it was made in consideration of Confederate securities, unless accompanied or followed by actual delivery of the cotton.

LEGAL CONSEQUENCES.

In proposing to do this the bill merely attempts to apply to the title to this cotton the ordinary principles of law governing transactions between private individuals. The following principles are well settled by many decisions of both English and American courts:

1. A vendor remaining in possession of the goods sold has a right, upon the insolvency of the vendee, to hold the goods until payment of the purchase price, even if title had already passed to the vendee.

2. This right extends even to property in transit before it reaches the vendee.

3. This right is unaffected by the execution of a note or other security by the vendee and its delivery to the vendor.

The following authorities support the first and second propositions:

In Bloxam v. Sanders (4 B. & C., 941), decided in the King's Bench in 1825, the right of a vendor to retain the goods sold to an insolvent vendee, but remaining in the vendor's possession, is positively and clearly laid down, as follows:

Where goods are sold, and nothing is said as to the time of the delivery or the time of payment, and everything the seller has to do with them is complete, the property vests in the buyer, so as to subject him to the risk of any accident which may happen to the goods, and the seller is liable to deliver them whenever they are demanded upon payment of the price, but the buyer has no right to have possession of the goods until he pays the price.

* * * * * * *

If goods are sold upon credit and nothing is agreed upon as to the time of delivering the goods, the vendee is immediately entitled to the possession, and the right of possession and the right of property vest at once in him, but his right of possession is not absolute; it is liable to be defeated if he becomes insolvent before he obtains possession. (Tooke v. Hollingsworth, 5 T. R., 215.)

In Northey v. Field (2 Esp., 613), the plaintiffs were assignees of merchants to whom wine had been consigned and who became bankrupt after the ship's arrival, but before the time expired for paying the duties. The wines were sold at auction for the duties. Before the sale the agent of the consignor claimed them. Suit was brought by plaintiffs to recover the proceeds.

Lord Kenyon said he was of the opinion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. The courts had of late years leaned much in favor of the power of the consignor to stop his goods in transitu. It was a leaning to the furtherance of justice.

See also Winks v. Hassall (9 B. & C., 372; Townley v. Crump (4 Ad. & El., 58).

The courts of this country have fully sustained this right, nowhere more learnedly than in Conrad v. Fisher (37 Mo. App., 352), where, in an opinion by the well-known authority, Judge Seymour D. Thompson, it is said, page 386:

On the contrary we affirm that, as between the vendor and vendee, laying out of view the rights of subsequent purchasers from the vendee, the vendor's lien is not divested by any species of constructive delivery, so long as he retains the actual custody of the goods, either by himself or by his own agent or servant. This doctrine is supported by the best English and American adjudications. * * * "There is," said Shaw, C. J., "manifestly a marked distinction between those cases, which, as between the vendor and vendee upon a contract of sale, go to make a constructive delivery and to vest the property in the vendee, and that actual delivery by the vendor to the vendee which puts an end to the right of the vendor to hold the goods as security for the price." Arnold v. Delano (4 Cush., Mass., 33, 38), quoted with approval in Thompson v. Baltimore, etc., Railroad Co. (28 Md., 396, 406). To the same effect is Newhall v. Vargas (15 Me., 314, 319). "The lien of the vendor," says Miller, J., "always exists until he voluntarily and utterly resigns the possession of the goods sold, and all right to detain them. So long as the vendor does not surrender actual possession his lien remains, although he may have performed acts which amount to a constructive delivery, so as to pass the title or avoid the statute"—meaning the statute of frauds. Thompson v. Baltimore, etc., Railroad (28 Md., 396, 407).

See also Vogelsang v. Fisher (128 Mo., 386; Robinson v. Morgan (65 Vt., 37); Arnold v. Delano (4 Cush., 33); Bell v. Moss (5 Whart., 89).

The proposition that the vendor's lien is not lost by taking the note or other security of the vendee is equally sustained by authority.

In D'Aquila v. Lambert (2 Eden, 75) plaintiff shipped goods to defendants and drew bills, which were accepted by him. Defendants stopped payment, the bills were protested, and defendants made an assignment. The plaintiff revoked the consignment and consigned the goods to his factor, but the creditors of the defendants also applied for the goods. The lord chancellor said:

The plaintiff is substantially to be considered as a merchant selling goods to Israeli. The case of ex parte Wilkinson is in point. It was determined, on solid reasons, that the goods of one man should not be applied in payment of another's debts. I must therefore decree the goods to be delivered to the plaintiff on payment of the insurance. The right of stoppage in transitu was first recognized by courts of equity. It was soon, however, upon the same principles of justice, adopted in courts of law.

In Miles v. Gorton (2 Cr. & M., 504) a bill accepted by the vendee was negotiated by the vendor, and the vendee became bankrupt. It was held that neither the negotiation of the bills nor the charge of warehouse rent while the goods remained in the possession of the vendor destroyed the vendor's lien for his purchase money. The court said:

It is an action by the assignees of a bankrupt who claims a right to the possession of some hops which had been sold to the bankrupt without paying the price for them, the question being whether the assignee, who stands in precisely the same situation as the bankrupt, can take the property out of the possession of the unpaid vendors. The general rule of law is that where there is a sale of goods and nothing is specified as to the delivery or payment, although everything may have been done so as to devest the property out of the vendor, and so as to throw upon the vendee all risk attendant upon the goods, still there results to the vendor out of the original contract a right to retain the goods until the payment of the price.

The same principle is asserted in regard to the right of stoppage in transitu, where the purchaser's notes are in the hands of a third person for a valuable consideration. In Mason v. Lickbarrow (1 H. Bl., 357) it is said:

I state it to be a clear proposition that the vendor of goods not paid for may retain possession against the vendee, not by aid of any equity, but on ground of law. Our oldest books consider the payment of the price (day not being given) as a condition precedent implied in the contract of sale, and that the vendee can not take the goods nor sue for them without tender of the price.

* * * * * * *

A designation of the goods by the vendor to the use of the vendee, the marking them or making them up to be delivered, the removing them for the purpose of being delivered, may all entitle the vendee to act as owner, to assign and to maintain an action against a third person, into whose hands they have come. But the title of the vendor is never entirely devested till the goods have come into the possession of the vendee. He has, therefore, a complete right, for just cause, to retract the intended delivery and to stop the goods in transitu. The cases determined in our courts of law have confirmed this doctrine, and the same law obtains in other countries.

The English courts went so far as to sustain this lien where the goods in controversy had been tortiously taken from the possession of the vendee by the vendor. See Stevens v. Wilkinson (2 B. & Ad., 320), Page v. Cowasjee (L. R. 1, P. C. App., 127).

In Clark v. Draper (19 N. H., 420), Woodland Co. v. Mendenhall (82 Minn., 483), the giving of notes for the purchase money was held not to affect the vendor's lien.

The owners of this cotton bring themselves plainly within these principles. They sold cotton to the Confederacy, but retained it in their possession. They received bonds, mere promises to pay, and held these also. At the close of the war, and the consequent insolvency of the vendee and maker of the bonds, they had a right to resume title to their cotton. The United States took this cotton and should pay for it under fixed rules of law.

NEED OF LEGISLATION.

What is the necessity of legislation? This arises from decisions made by the Supreme Court of the United States in the years not long after the close of the Civil War, and at a time when the proper historical perspective had not been established from which questions arising from the war could be viewed without passion. The Supreme Court held, in Sprott v. United States (20 Wall., 459), in the year 1874, that a person who had purchased cotton from the Confederate Government could not assert a claim to the net proceeds of that cotton in the United States Treasury. This decision was based upon the ground that payment for the cotton to the Confederacy was in aid of the rebellion, and the contract was therefore entirely void and gave no title to the property purchased. Justice Field read a very able dissenting opinion and two other judges refused to concur in the reasoning of the court.

In Whitfield v. United States (92 U. S., 165), decided in 1875, cotton was sold to the Confederacy, payment taken in bonds, and the property left with the vendor, by whom a bill of sale was executed, agreeing to hold the cotton subject to the order of the Confederate secretary of the treasury. While both cotton and bonds were in the hands of the vendor the Confederacy dissolved and the bonds became worthless. After the actual war was over the cotton was taken by the United States Treasury agents, and the net proceeds reached the Treasury. The original owner sued for the proceeds and maintained (1) that under the rules of law just asserted the vendor's right to the cotton remaining in his possession became absolute upon the purchaser's insolvency without payment of the bonds; and (2) that under the doctrine of Sprott against United States, just cited, the sale to the Confederate Government was void, and no title had ever passed out of him.

The Supreme Court refused to recognize the application of the rules of private right to this case, and said that the sale of the cotton to the Confederacy was in aid of the rebellion; that the owner's rights must follow the fortunes of war, and that the cotton came into the possession of the United States by right of conquest. Therefore it was held that the owner had no right to assert his vendor's lien. The Sprott case was cited as authority to sustain this decision. It was thus held that a sale from the Confederate Government and a sale to the Confederate Government equally vitiated an individual's title to cotton.

The Whitfield case is typical of those which this bill is designed to relieve. The reasons why it is believed that the rule there announced should no longer stand as the rule governing the relations between the United States and these claimants are the following:

I. THE RULES OF LAW SUPREME.

It is a settled principle that the same rules of law which govern the rights of private individuals in relation to title to private property also control the Government in like dealings with individuals. Thus the Supreme Court says (Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall., 203, 232):

When a State becomes a party to a contract, as in the case before us, the same rules of law are applied to her as to private persons under like circumstances. When she or her representatives are properly brought into the forum of litigation, neither she nor they can assert any right or immunity as incident to her political sovereignty.

See also the same principle asserted in the Floyd Acceptances (7 Wall., 666, 675); United States v. State Bank (96 U. S., 30, 36).

This is the rule properly applicable here. The question was one of the title to private property between the individual planter and two sovereignties. That was dependent on settled rules of law. We have seen that these declare:

First. That a vendor in possession has a right to retain the goods sold, if not paid for, upon the insolvency of the vendee.

Second. That his right is not affected by the receipt of a note or other security from the vendee.

These are the principles upon which the question of title, a matter of civil and not military law, should be decided.

II. RULES OF LAW APPLIED.

A like conflict arose in England over the rights of individuals and the United States to property belonging to the Confederate States at the date of their dissolution.

In United States v. McRae (8 Law Reports, Equity, 69) the United States filed a bill in the court of chancery in England to obtain an account of all moneys and goods which came to the hands of the defendant, as agent or otherwise, on behalf of the Confederate Government during the war, and the payment of the moneys in his hands, and the delivery of the goods in his possession. The court held that with respect to all public property acquired by the insurrectionary government, the right of the United States was that of a successor of the Confederate Government; and that they could recover such property from an agent of that Government, subject to the same rights and obligations to which that Government would have been subjected, had it not been overthrown.

In the case of United States v. Prioleau (2 Hemmings & Miller's Chancery cases, 559) the same court again held that the Government of the United States could recover the property of the Confederate Government, as its successor or representative in the hands of its agents, but that they must take it subject to all the liens and conditions arising from the contract upon which this property was received by the agents.

This is the rule which should be applied to the title of the present claimants.

III. DECISIONS AS WAR POLICY.

The decisions, both in Sprott v. United States and Whitfield v. United States, were rendered within a very few years after the close of the war. The reader of these decisions at the present day, when nearly half a century has passed, still can feel in them the throb of passion which that great struggle aroused. The feelings of the war were the real cause of both decisions.

IV. THE WAR WAS ENDED IN FACT.

The war was, in fact, at an end. The authority of the United States was no longer disputed. The armies of the Confederacy had disbanded. The soldiers had become artisans, merchants, and tillers of the soil. The taking of this property was therefore not in fact the exercise of war power, but a civil transaction. The rights of the United States should not be determined by the laws of war and the right of capture, but should rest entirely upon the rights of property as determined by civil law in individual cases.

The Supreme Court had already held that war existed in law until August 20, 1866 (Anderson v. United States, 9 Wall., 71), although in fact suppressed more than a year before. It therefore felt bound in Whitfield v. United States to give to the Government in the summer of 1865 the benefit of war rights and to refuse to the claimant the kinder principles governing the title to property under civil law.

The time has now come for Congress to declare another and truer rule. The ultimate purpose of section 162 of the Judicial Code is to declare the war at an end on June 1, 1865, to give a remedy for captures after that date, and to restore all rights of property to a civil basis from that date. To that end it is directed that all property taken after that date shall be paid to is owners. The object is to establish, as far as is now practicable, the conditions which would have existed had the abandoned and captured property act been repealed on that date. This full purpose can be accomplished only by the enactment of the bill I now propose, recognizing the rules of law relating to the title to private property without the assertion of rights derived from capture.

V. CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY ACT INAPPLICABLE.

A careful examination of the captured and abandoned property act of March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. L., 820), clearly shows that it gave no right to the Government to seize the cotton in question. Its first section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint agents "to receive and collect all abandoned or captured property in any State in insurrection." A legislative definition was given to the word "abandoned" by the amendatory act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. L., 376), as follows:

> Property, real or personal, shall be regarded as abandoned when the lawful owner thereof shall be voluntarily absent therefrom and engaged, either in arms or otherwise, in aiding or encouraging the rebellion.

An equally authoritative definition of "captured" property was made by the circular of the Secretary of the Treasury of July 3, 1863, quoted in United States v. Padelford (9 Wall., 540), as property "which had been seized or taken from hostile possession by the military or naval forces of the United States."

Neither of these definitions includes this property. The owner was not engaged in aiding or encouraging the rebellion, because the rebellion had been suppressed; and the property was not in hostile possession, because hostilities had ceased.

Thus the seizure of this property gained no validity from the provisions of those acts. The real test in law of the rights of the parties should not be those arising under the protection of those acts, which were avowedly war measures, but the standard of right under recognized rules of law guarding title to private property. The pending bill declares and enforces that standard.

VI. ALL EQUITIES FOR THE CLAIMANTS.

The Supreme Court, in the Whitfield case, rests its decision for the United States upon a very strict legal title, depending on a rigid view of the disabilities imposed by aiding the rebellion. All the equities of the case were with the plaintiff. He parted with the nominal title to his cotton, and received therefor securities of little value when received, which soon became worthless. He retained possession both of his cotton and of the bonds. The maker of this security, the Confederate States, not only became insolvent, but totally disappeared from existence. The planter therefore clearly would be right in considering the cotton as his own, since he had never lost possession and had received no valuable consideration, and the vendee was nonexistent. The use of that cotton by the people of the Southern States in rehabilitating their ruined plantations and homes would have gone a long step toward relieving the immediate distress incident to the war.

But the United States, claiming the ownership of all cotton which had ever and in any form substantially or formally belonged to the Confederate Government, exacted the pound of flesh from the planter and deprived him of these tangible assets in his possession. At this late date, when the passions aroused by the war have subsided and we can look with historic calmness upon these great events, it is plain that so stringent an assertion of the rights of the conqueror against a prostrate people was an excessive exercise of sovereign power. It is therefore the object of this bill to undo the wrong thus done and to say to the few survivors, and to the children of the deceased that the cotton for which no real consideration was received from the Confederate Government and which remained in the planter's possession until the collapse of the Confederacy shall be treated as the property of the planter and the net proceeds now in the Treasury paid to him or to his surviving next of kin. The amendatory act is one of simple justice. [Applause.]

VII. NO REAL CONSIDERATION.

Lest the objection be made that the delivery of the bonds to the planter was a valuable consideration, a short historical discussion is now pertinent and entitled to consideration.

The sales of cotton to the Confederacy were between December, 1862, and June, 1863, and the records of the Confederate treasury department show that the price paid was from 13½ cents to 15 cents a pound, paid in Confederate bonds. In the learned work, published by Yale University, entitled "The Confederate States of America," by John Christopher Schwab, a table is given as Appendix I which shows the monthly value of gold in Confederate currency during this period, as follows:

December, 1863	2.9
January, 1864	3.0
February, 1864	3.3
March, 1864	4.1
April, 1864	4.5
May, 1864	5.2
June, 1864	7.0
Average for 7 months	4.3

See also History of Confederate Treasury, by Ernest A. Smith, publications of Southern Historical Association, volume 5, pages 225–226.

At the rate of 15 cents per pound in Confederate currency the planter therefore received from 2.1 to 5.2 cents per pound, or an average of 3.5 cents per pound in gold. Middling upland cotton was worth in New York during the same seven months an average of 70.7 cents per pound. See tables of New York prices in Chronological and Statistical History of Cotton, by E. J. Donnell, pages 518–522. It is thus plain that the amount paid in depreciated bonds was a very small fraction of the actual market value of cotton at this time.

Had the planter been allowed to hold the cotton and sell it in New York in the summer of 1865 he would have received 50.7 cents per pound in May and 43.9 cents per pound in September. See the same authorities. Allowing for all expenses of carriage, commission, and middlemen, it can be seen how great a loss was inflicted upon the planter by the Government taking his cotton. The remedy proposed, namely, to give the net proceeds in the Treasury, after the enormous expenses charged against it by the Treasury agents and their subordinates and the losses incident to the methods then adopted, gives but a fraction of what the planter would have realized had the Government refrained from taking it.

While the bonds of the Confederate Government were theoretically convertible into currency, yet the least study of the financial policy of the Confederacy shows the constant effort to secure the conversion of currency into bonds by its holders. Every possible effort was made to induce creditors to receive bonds instead of currency, even the railroads taking pay for services one-half in bonds. It is therefore plain that the citizens of the Confederate States, loyally devoted to its aims, purposely refrained from converting their bonds into currency to the disadvantage of the Government. Indeed, with the governmental pressure the other way they would have found difficulty in securing such conversion. See both the works already cited where these conditions are fully shown. For these reasons it may confidently be asserted that the bonds issued in payment for this cotton remained almost without exception in the hands of the planter to whom they were issued. After the lapse of half a century they can be found but in few instances, but this is not remarkable since during all the time they had been worth more as waste paper than as bonds.

THIRD PROVISO—BANKRUPTCY.

The third proviso directs that the proceeds of claims under this section shall go to the personal representatives rather than to assignees in bankruptcy of the original owners of the cotton. This is similar to the provision contained in the bills for payment of the southern claims under the Bowman Act and the French spoliation claims (26 Stat. L., 908, 1456; 30 Stat. L., 1191, 121; 32 Stat. L., 218, 245; 33 Stat. L., 780, 811). Argument is unnecessary to show the propriety of giving the proceeds of these claims to the families of the owners of the cotton rather than scattering them among distant creditors who have long since forgotten their claims.

CONCLUSION.

All three of the provisos to this bill are essential to carry out the intent of the original enactment. In particular the second proviso should be declared the rule of law, because:

1. It is necessary to afford the relief designed by the original act.

2. It declares the war ended for purposes of these claims when actual hostilities closed.

3. It substitutes a rule of civil law for a harsh rule of war.

4. It recognizes a principle of justice and consideration for a conquered people in place of a merciless exaction of the utmost legal right.

Mr. Chairman, I have presented this argument in support of this bill in order that I might have an opportunity to get into this record, and to present to the people of the country, the legal phases of the question which is now before the court, subject to the difficulties with which that question is met by the law officers of the United States. I do not criticize the legal representatives of the Government of the United States for presenting the defenses which they invoke in these cases. As honest men representing the Government, it is their duty to perform this service. In my judgment, however, it was the purpose of the original section 162, when passed by the Congress of the United States, to refund this money now in the Treasury of the United States to those who were entitled to it. It was intended that they should receive it, and these technical defenses having been interposed may prevent the carrying out of the purpose and the intent of the Congress of the United States in passing the law, and the purpose and object of the bill I have introduced is simply to amend that statute in such a way as to take away these technical defenses so that the purpose and intention of the Congress of the United States in the passage of the original act, section 162 of the Judicial Code, may be carried out and these just claims paid.

In this time of peace, when we all stand beneath the clear blue skies as citizens of a great Republic, each one loving the flag that flies above us, willing to do anything we can to uphold and sustain it, simple justice demands that we should be honest enough—not only generous enough, but honest enough—to return this money to these people who lost it because they were prostrate and helpless, who lost it contrary to right and justice, who lost it by reason of the iron hand that existed at the time and demanded it from them and put it into the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANDLER. Just a little more time, please.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I hope my colleague will be given more time. Mississippi is greatly interested in these claims.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I join in the request that the gentleman be given more time. He is certainly making a most interesting and entertaining speech, and giving us much valuable information showing the justice of these claims.

Mr. PAGE. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional time if necessary to conclude his remarks.

Mr. CANDLER. I thank the gentleman, and I will hurry as much as possible.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER. With pleasure.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. By reason of your devotion to duty and Democratic principles you are always listened to with close attention. Your speech has thrown great light on this question, and will speed, I am sure, the payment of these claims. You have shown their justice; and they ought to be, and I hope will be paid. I favor their payment and will aid you in any way I can to bring about that result.

Mr. CANDLER. I thank my friend from Texas.

Now, permit me to say in conclusion, that this great Government of ours does not need this cotton money and can not afford to longer keep it. It only needs honest money—money that comes into the Treasury by the will of the people—for the support of the Government and for the development of our institutions for the great progress which is ahead of us, and this Government can well afford to return this money to the noble and brave people of the South who lost it in time of stress and strife. They come not here to-day, through me as their representative, as mendicants or beggars, because, thank God, they have always been brave and courageous enough to meet every difficulty which has been presented to them and surmount them all; and I am glad to-day that peace, prosperity, and happiness is in the Southland and is blessing our people, and that we are able still to meet our difficulties and overcome them; but I come as their representative pleading an honest and just cause, and simply asking this great Government to do justice to a patriotic people, and in doing so to do honor to itself, and give some comfort to them. In the passage of my bill this will be to some extent accomplished. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SIMS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 7002. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant to Salt Lake City, Utah, a right of way over certain public lands for reservoir purposes;

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution (S. Res. 333):

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. GEORGE S. NIXON, late a Senator from the State of Nevada.

Resolved, That a committee of 12 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect his remains be removed from Washington to Reno, Nev., for burial, in charge of the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, attended by the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

In compliance with the foregoing, the Vice President appointed as said committee Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. BAILEY, Mr.

WORKS, Mr. HEYBURN, Mr. BROWN, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. OLIVER, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. FALL, and Mr. ASHURST.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, we, as the representatives of the people of the United States, are charged with the important duty of voting the necessary money to meet the proper expenses of this Government in the executive, legislative, and judicial branches. In view of our representative capacity in this respect, and for the further reason that in a short time the people of this country will be called upon to select a President of the United States, Members of Congress, and other officials of the Government, it seems to me that this is a proper time to call to the attention of the House an approximate number of qualified electors in the various States. I therefore submit the two following tables, the first showing, for continental United States, geographic divisions and individual States, the distribution of males 21 years of age and over by literacy, by elements, according to the censuses of 1910 and 1900; and the second showing, for the above areas, the distribution of foreign-born white males 21 years of age and over, according to citizenship, in 1910 and 1900:

Total males 21 years of age and over by literacy, by elements.

Mr. DYER. The above shows that in 1910 there were 71,580,270 persons 10 years of age or over in the United States, of whom 5,517,608 were unable to read or write, constituting 7.7 per cent of the population.

The native whites, who constituted nearly 75 per cent of the entire population, had the smallest number of illiterates, 1,535,530, or 3 per cent.

The foreign-born whites had 1,650,519 illiterates, or 12.8 per cent of their number.

The colored had 2,331,559 illiterates, or 30.5 per cent.

DECLINE IN ILLITERACY.

Comparing 1910 with 1900, there was a gain of 13,640,456 in the population of 10 years of age and over, but the number of illiterates fell off 663,461. There was consequently a decline in the percentage of illiteracy from 10.7 to 7.7 per cent for the aggregate population.

Among native whites the number of illiterates diminished 378,081, and as the population increased the percentage fell from 4.6 per cent in 1900 to 3 per cent in 1910.

Among the colored there was a decrease of 647,864 illiterates and a diminution of the percentage of illiteracy from 44.5 per cent to 30.5 per cent.

Among the foreign whites there was the slight increase of 363,384 in the number of illiterate persons, but the whole number of foreign whites had largely increased, the percentage of illiteracy remains practically the same as 10 years ago, being 12.8 per cent in 1910 and 12.9 per cent in 1900. The tabular summary follows:

Population 10 years of age and over.

Year.	Total.	Unable to read and write.
		Number.	Per cent.
1900.
Native white	41,236,662	1,913,611	4.6
Foreign white	10,014,256	1,287,135	12.9
Colored	6,698,906	2,979,323	44.5
All classes	57,949,824	6,180,069	10.7
1910.
Native white	50,989,343	1,535,530	3.0
Foreign white	12,944,215	1,650,519	12.8
Colored	7,646,712	2,331,559	30.5
All classes	71,580,270	5,517,608	7.7

It is gratifying indeed to note that the colored illiterates have decreased in the last 10 years from 44.5 per cent to 30.5 per cent. This shows progress, and I sincerely hope that the next 10 years will see even greater advancement.

On April 2, 1912, Senator BRADLEY, of Kentucky, in the Senate, in urging the enactment into law of Senate bill 180, providing for the celebration of the semicentennial anniversary of the act of emancipation, and for other purposes, said, concerning the progress of the colored race:

Since the negroes were freed they have increased from 4,000,000 to 10,000,000 in population. They own to-day, notwithstanding they were freed without any property, more than $600,000,000. They have 135 private high schools. They have 30,000 teachers, 82 banks, 500 newspapers and periodicals. They have decreased in illiteracy 47 per cent. They have 1,500 lawyers, 2,500 physicians, several thousand ministers, some of whom are among the ablest men in the United States. They have 149 wholesale houses, 9,098 retail merchants, and 1,186 manufactories. Among them are scientists, poets, authors, musicians, artists, and inventors, and they have 2,000,000 children in the schools.

The object of this bill is to give them a chance to call prominently to the attention of the people of this Nation what they have accomplished and to show their progress, to encourage their people to the accomplishment of greater things, and to show the white people the extent of their improvement in order that they may better merit their help and sympathy.

Mr. President, it seems to me when we consider the fact that these people for so many years bent their backs in bondage in unrequited toil in order to make fortunes for others; that they were denied every right of manhood, every opportunity of education; that during the Civil War, notwithstanding their freedom was at stake, in the whole southern country not one of them ever committed an outrage, although they were left in charge of the wives and children of the Confederate soldiers who were fighting to continue them in slavery, now that they are citizens of the United States it is our duty to lift them up, to help them, to strengthen them, to encourage them, to make them better citizens, and to make them of more value, force, and virtue in this great Republic.

This is but a pittance, and it is conditioned upon their raising among themselves $50,000 before they can enjoy the appropriation. I do not think that the spirit of economy should be such as to prevent the passage of any bill which has for its purpose the betterment of humanity, the betterment of our country, and the improvement of its citizens. I hope the bill may pass.

This Government should continue to do its utmost to help the colored man in his desire to advance in intellect, business, morality, and other ways. I am in hopes that the House will, during this session, pass the bill referred to above, and which has already passed the Senate, appropriating $250,000 to help the colored people show to the people of this country and of the world the great advancement that they have made since they became a free people.

The colored men have heretofore been given opportunity to show their worth as officials of this Government. Some of them have and are now holding important official positions, and have uniformly given credit to the Government as well as their race. As proof of the above I might mention the names of a few of the colored men who are to-day holding important positions in the Government service, among whom are the following:

H. W. Furniss, of Indiana, minister to Haiti; Dr. W. D. Crum, of South Carolina, minister to Liberia; Charles W. Anderson, of New York, collector of internal revenue, New York City; Joseph E. Lee, collector of internal revenue, Jacksonville, Fla.; Henry Lincoln Johnson, of Georgia, recorder of deeds, District of Columbia; R. W. Tyler, of Ohio, Auditor for the Navy Department; Whitefield McKinley, collector of customs, Washington; Charles A. Cottrell, of Ohio, collector of customs, Hawaii; Robert H. Terrell, judge of municipal court, District of Columbia; J. E. Bush, receiver, land office, Little Rock, Ark.; T. V. McAllister, receiver, land office, Jackson, Miss.; Nathan Alexander, register, land office, Montgomery, Ala.; W. C. Matthews, assistant United States district attorney, Boston, Mass.; S. L. Williams, assistant United States district attorney, Chicago, Ill.; James A. Cobb, special United States district attorney, Washington; Gen. Robert Smalls, collector of customs, Beaufort, S. C.; Mrs. E. P. Booze, postmaster, Mound Bayou, Miss.; Thomas Richardson, postmaster, Port Gibson, Miss.; W. T. Vernon, supervisor of Indian and Negro schools; W. D. Johnson, Forest Service, Department of Agriculture, and so forth.

The highest salary paid an Afro-American is received by the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States to Haiti, whose salary is $10,000 per annum. A number of Government officials receive from $2,500 to $5,000 per year. Clerks are paid from $900 to $1,800.

The total number of Afro-Americans in all branches of the service of the United States Government is, in round numbers, 15,000, and the aggregate annual salaries paid amount to nearly $10,000,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY] 60 minutes.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, this Nation never more fittingly observed its birthday than it did on the 4th of July, 1789, when it approved an act for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States for the necessary support of government, the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures.

Practically since the foundation of this Government—to be exact, since July 4, 1789—we have had a tariff law which has levied a tax upon certain articles imported into this country. This tax, as a general rule, has been levied for the double purpose of raising a revenue for the support of the Government and to protect our industries.

So far as the Republican Party is concerned, it has at all times stood for and demanded a tariff for this double purpose, while our Democratic friends have universally contended, as they now do, for a tariff for revenue only and not for protection's sake. In other words, they tolerate a tariff for revenue as a matter of necessity and at the same time declare a tariff which affords protection to our many industries a robbery.

What the position of the two great political parties upon this question has been and is is well known in Congress, but it has not been understood by the people of the country at large, and we find in every manufacturing center of the country Democratic spellbinders deliberately attempting to deceive their audiences by pointing out the fact to be that tariff laws framed by them when in power afforded a measure of protection as well as raised a revenue for the support of the Government; while, on the other hand, other representatives of the Democratic Party before their audiences in different sections of our country have taught the doctrine of free trade and have roundly denounced the Republican tariff, or any tariff designed to protect our industries, as a robbery of the many for the benefit of the few, and by this method, particularly in manufacturing centers, have secured the support of protectionists, while with the doctrine of free trade in other sections they have secured the support of free traders.

It is my intention to place upon the records of Congress something from which the people of the country at large may know the position of each party upon this greatest of questions, upon which presidential elections have been lost and won for more than a half century, and for that purpose I desire to call the attention of the House to some recent statements made by the leaders of the Democratic Party in the United States Senate and the House of Representatives upon this subject, as well as to point out their official action with reference to various tariff bills which have been given consideration since the country thoughtlessly trusted them with power in this body a year ago, which will conclusively prove the facts to be just as I have stated them.

Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, June 7, 1911, on the wool schedule:

Mr. Chairman, in presenting this bill to the House we distinctly draw the dividing line between the two great political parties in this country from the standpoint on which they write tariff bills to obtain revenue to support the Government.

The Republican Party, as declared in their platform, presents tariff legislation for the purpose of levying duties at rates that will equal the difference in cost at home and abroad and at the same time protect a reasonable profit to the American manufacturers.

Their declaration is primarily in favor of levying tariffs in the interest of the great manufacturing classes of this country. The question of raising revenue is incidental to levying a tax to prevent foreign competition.

The Democratic Party does not believe that any interest in this country is entitled primarily to the fostering care of the Government of the United States. * * * The primary purpose from the beginning of those who believe in the principles of the Democratic Party is to levy these taxes for the purpose of supplying the revenue of the Government, and if any protection arises from the levying of these taxes it is a mere incident, which grows out of the constitutional warrant given by the people to levy taxes at the customhouse. * * *

Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, July 28, 1911, on the cotton schedule:

As I have stated before on this floor, I am anxious, if we have the power to do so, to reduce every schedule in the tariff bill to a strictly revenue basis.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN, a Senator from North Carolina, June 12, 1909, on the tariff:

Mr. President, there has never been a tariff bill passed by Congress but that there were differences between individual Senators belonging to the same party in regard to some details or items in the schedules of every bill, and especially those items to be locally affected. But there was, and is now, very little difference among the Democrats as to the fundamental principles of the party upon this great question. * * * We have honestly differed as to whether some few articles should not go on the free list or the dutiable list; but, however we may have differed in this respect, the party has been united on the fundamental principles of a tariff for revenue.

Hon. ISIDOR RAYNER, a Senator from Maryland, April 29, 1909, on the tariff:

In 1876 the platform upon which Mr. Tilden was nominated declared: "We denounce the present tariff, levied upon nearly 4,000 articles, as a masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretenses. * * * We demand that all customhouse taxation shall be only for revenue."

In 1892 the platform upon which Mr. Cleveland was nominated proclaimed: "We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the purpose of revenue only."

As I understood at that time, these tariff planks were written, respectively, by the Democratic leaders whose names I have mentioned, and they embody, in my judgment, our party axiom.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BAILEY, a Senator from Texas, April 26, 1909, on the tariff:

The practical question, therefore, between us and our adversaries, when fairly stated, is simply this: "Shall tariff duties be imposed for the purpose of raising revenue for the support of the Government, or shall they be imposed for the purpose of protecting certain classes of our people against foreign competition?"

Hon. FRANCIS BURTON HARRISON, of New York, a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, March 27, 1909, on the tariff:

The protection afforded by our revenue law should be simply and solely incidental to the necessity of procuring revenue sufficient honestly and economically to administer this Government.

Hon. ISADOR RAYNER, a Senator from Maryland, May 29, 1912, on the metal schedule:

I contend for the proposition that we have not any right to protect the industries of our own States. I am for a tariff for revenue; I am for putting everything on the free list that can be put upon the free list consistent with the raising of revenue. If a tariff for revenue gives incidental protection I can not help it, but I am for a tariff for revenue. I am not for a tariff for protection with incidental revenue, and I believe that the vast majority of Senators on this side agree with me in the views that I have expressed. * * *

The overwhelming majority of the Senators on this side have always voted for a tariff for revenue as against a tariff for protection.

Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES, of Kentucky, recently elected to the United States Senate from that State, March 29, 1909, upon the tariff:

And right here I want to say that no Democrat can justify his position before his people in undertaking to get a protective tariff upon something the people of his district produce, for when he does he strengthens the bands of protection everywhere.

Hon. THOMAS U. SISSON, of Mississippi, March 29, 1909, on the tariff:

I will go on record with all my heart by saying that I am opposed to protection on anything.

Hon. WILLIAM RICHARDSON, of Alabama, March 30, 1909, on the tariff:

The Democratic Party contends that every tariff duty imposed should be primarily for revenue.

Hon. BENJAMIN G. HUMPHREYS, of Mississippi, April 3, 1909, on the tariff:

I am opposed to the policy of protection utterly, and by that I mean to say that in my opinion a tariff should be imposed for the one sole and only purpose of raising revenue for the Government. * * * I am not in sympathy with the so-called policy of "a tariff for revenue with incidental protection." If I should write a tariff law I would write it with the sole view of raising revenue, and whatever protection that it afforded would be accidental rather than incidental.

The first bill passed by the Democracy at our extra session of Congress a year ago was the so-called reciprocity bill, which was little else than a free-trade measure, and absolutely so, so far as section 2 is concerned, which placed print paper upon the free list, although it was known to all at the time that the cost to the American manufacturer was, according to the Tariff Board,

$5.35 per ton more than to its nearest and most dangerous competitor in Canada, and notwithstanding the fact that the Canadians repudiated the proposed contract long before the meeting of this present Congress, the Ways and Means Committee of this House has absolutely refused to report, either favorably or otherwise, my bill introduced in December, 1911, to repeal this iniquitous and unfair measure, while one of our country's greatest industries hangs trembling in the balance as to whether it will survive or perish.

I think that it is one of the most important things in the coming election of a President of the United States to have the people of this country know where the parties stand upon this very important question of repealing this so-called reciprocity bill and putting print paper on the free list.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MALBY. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There will not be any misunderstanding as to where President Taft stands, will there? He has not changed his mind.

Mr. MALBY. I do not think that the gentleman has any right to say that President Taft has not changed his mind, for I believe he has. Everything which has occurred since the passage of this bill could not fail to convince a man of much less intelligence than President Taft where the American people stand on this important subject. I saw in the newspapers a little while ago that when our distinguished President was campaigning in the State of Ohio he said that reciprocity was dead. I mean the reciprocity bill. So far as we are concerned, whether we voted for or against it—and the majority of this side were against it—so far as I have power to speak for the minority, that legislation is forever dead. If you do not concur in its burial, of course you can keep the corpse alive just as long as you want to and be responsible. But the people ought to know that you are responsible for it.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MALBY. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. The Senate, as I suppose the gentleman is aware, did take up that question and acted upon it.

Mr. MALBY. Yes; and I did desire to call attention to the fact that despite the omission on the part of our Democratic Ways and Means Committee to take any action with reference to my bill providing for a repeal of the reciprocity bill, we find that a Republican Senate committee has acted favorably upon a bill which repeals section 1 of that law relating to farm products, which ought to be repealed, and amends section 2 by placing a duty of $2 per ton upon paper. This affords some measure at least of protection to this great and important industry. I hope that when the bill comes over here there will be an opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. PAYNE. Right there, if the gentleman will permit; it has come over here with these amendments and been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and the majority of that committee, the Democrats, have voted to nonconcur in that amendment which repeals the law and puts a duty of $2 a ton upon paper.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged to my colleague from New York for calling my attention to the fact that the bill has already come over and that it has been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and that the majority, to wit, the Democrats, have moved to nonconcur in that amendment. This shows conclusively their position upon the subject of reciprocity.

Then followed the passage of the bills revising the woolen schedule, the cotton schedules, iron and steel schedules, leather and chemical schedules, and others, without giving the slightest heed or consideration to the question of protecting these great industries.

I find, upon consulting the most recent records upon industries more or less affected by this proposed legislation, that there is invested in manufactures in this country at the present time over $21,000,000,000, with an annual output valued at over $23,000,000,000; that there are paid in salaries and wages about $5,000,000,000 and for materials about $15,000,000,000. Over 8,000,000 of our people, in about 300,000 establishments, are engaged in the manufacturing industries of this country.

I find, according to the report issued by the Bureau of Manufactures of the Census for 1909, which is the latest available, that the value of the output of the foundry and machine shops for that year was $1,228,475,000; the number of persons employed, 615,485; that they were paid in salaries and wages $415,316,000. In the iron and steel industries for the same year the total value of the annual output was $985,723,000, the number of persons employed was 260,762, and the salaries and wages paid amounted to $189,393,000.

The value of the cotton goods manufactured for the same year was $628,392,000, the number of persons employed 387,771, and the wages and salaries paid $147,271,000.

In woolen and worsted and felt goods manufactured this same year, I find that the value of the product was $435,979,000, with 175,176 persons employed, and wages and salaries amounting to $82,524,000.

In the pulp and print paper industry, which was nearly destroyed under section 2 of the Canadian reciprocity bill, I find there were 777 establishments doing business in the year 1909 which employed directly in their manufacturing establishments 81,473 persons, with an invested capital of $409,348,000, and paying wages and salaries annually amounting to $50,315,000. The cost of material was $165,442,000, and the value of the annual output was $267,657,000.

I call attention particularly to that great industry because it is a matter which is to come before the House in a very little while. I might call the attention of the House also to the fact, if it interests the membership here, that since less than a year ago, commencing with August of last year, more than twice the quantity of print paper is being brought into the United States from abroad now than was brought in at that time, and that not a single new paper mill has gone up in this country since the reciprocity bill was passed, while a dozen or more mills have gone up in Canada, or are in process of construction.

Mr. ESCH. What has the effect been upon the prices of paper in the United States?

Mr. MALBY. I am glad that the gentleman asked that question, because the question of price is always an argument one way or another. It has not had any effect upon prices, and for this reason, as I called attention to a moment ago. Not a single additional paper mill has gone up in this country during the past year. The output of our paper mills is less than it was a year ago. They have simply permitted the foreign product to come into the country and be sold at a high price, reducing their own output by precisely the same amount that has been brought in. That has been the cause, and the output of our mills will continue to decrease in the same proportion as the Canadian mills continue to grow and increase.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MALBY. I do.

Mr. SIMS. How many new mills has the International Paper Co. put up in the 10 years prior to the passage of the reciprocity bill?

Mr. MALBY. I do not know, but I do know that the International Paper Co., which very largely does business in the district that I have the honor to represent, had sufficient capacity to more than supply their demand, and that they have got a greater capacity to-day than they are now using. It was not necessary for them to put up any new mills, and you will never live to see the day, unless this law is repealed, when a single new news print paper mill will go up in this country. And if you pass the bills that you passed a year ago and this year, and they ever become laws, in my judgment you have seen practically the last cotton mill and the last woolen mill and the last iron and steel mill go up in this country that you will ever see go up.

The proposition to me is so plain that it does not require any argument. There is only one of two things that can possibly happen when the tariff is repealed: Either our laboring men must work for what their competitors are working for abroad, or else quit the job. That proposition is so plain that it ought not to require argument. It does seem to, however; but if you are going to reduce the wages of the laboring men of this country to the level of those engaged in the cotton and woolen mills of England and France and Germany, I want to tell you that you want to increase the standing Army of the United States by tenfold to maintain order throughout the country and protect life and property. The laboring men of this country who have once tasted of good wages will never pauperize themselves to the extent of competing throughout the world with labor paid so inadequately.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman another question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MALBY. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. What per cent of the total cost of a ton of paper is represented by labor?

Mr. MALBY. Substantially all.

Mr. SIMS. Not 10 per cent.

Mr. MALBY. Oh, I know very well what it will cost. I know, sir, this, that you can buy from the forests of the Canadian Government to-day, or you could less than a year ago, for 50 cents per cord, the tree standing where you find it. You know that, for the evidence taken by the committee of which you were a member shows that. It takes a cord and a half of wood to make a ton of paper; that is, 75 cents' worth of wood. That paper is worth $45 a ton in the markets of the United States to-day, and was when you made the investigation. Now, tell me where the money goes. Certainly not to the paper makers, who have never received in this country a fair or even a moderate return for the capital invested.

Mr. SIMS. Do you want to put a tax on Canadian wood to come here to make paper?

Mr. MALBY. There is no tax on Canadian wood.

Mr. SIMS. Do you want any to go on?

Mr. MALBY. No.

Mr. SIMS. You do not need revenue in that direction?

Mr. MALBY. We do not, when our country is depending upon Canadian wood. I am not in favor of a tax upon things which we do not produce in sufficient quantities in this country to satisfy the demand, except when such tax is necessary to protect the industry and those who labor in it, and this is not one of those cases. That is not protection. That is robbery; but it is your theory of a revenue tax for the support of the Government.

In the chemical industries I find that in the year 1909 there were employed 27,791 persons, with an invested capital of $155,144,000, and paying wages and salaries amounting to $20,222,000. The materials employed cost $64,122,000, and the value of the annual output was $117,689,000.

Notwithstanding the importance of these great industries to the whole people of the United States, and particularly to the millions employed therein, it is an astounding fact that the Ways and Means Committee of this House, which originated all of this legislation, held only secret sessions while preparing these bills, at which not a single person representing these great industries or otherwise was permitted to be present or heard, and even the Republican Members, among whom was the distinguished Representative from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and a former chairman of the committee, were not permitted to be present during the time the Democratic Members were formulating these measures. In view of this extreme secrecy and lack of consideration, the results of their labors are not to be wondered at. I do not know whether my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has sat in the councils of his committee during the formulation of these tariff bills this year or not. He told me he did not last year.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman ask whether we were called in to formulate these bills?

Mr. MALBY. Yes; that is my question.

Mr. PAYNE. No; the bills which had been formulated by the majority members of the committee are simply presented in the committee, and we have an hour in the committee, and half of that time is used in voting on the bills and the report.

Mr. MALBY. That is all the opportunity you have had to consider them?

Mr. PAYNE. All that the minority members of the committee have had.

Mr. MALBY. Such a procedure as that ought to shame the legislative body of the greatest country upon the face of the earth.

Mr. SIMS. Was not the Payne bill passed the same way?

Mr. MALBY. No; the Payne bill was not passed the same way. The country knows that it was not passed the same way. I know and the gentleman knows that for many long, weary months the committee labored to give every interest and every individual in this broad land an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. BARTLETT. The manufacturers.

Mr. MALBY. Yes; manufacturers, the people, and anybody who wanted an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say that the importers who represent the consumers and have knowledge of facts that consumers generally do not were heard, and heard as fully and were as welcome to the committee as were the manufacturers, notwithstanding the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MALBY. Of course they were.

Mr. SIMS. When I said "the same way," I had reference to the committee's action with reference to the minority members.

Mr. MALBY. Not at all. I appeared before the committee, and I do not think that I was accorded a privilege that was not accorded to everybody else. I talked for an hour, and I know my Democratic friends were there; the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the distinguished Speaker were there, and asked me a number of questions. I did not see that anybody was hindered from being heard.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to suggest that there were various Democratic Members of the House who came before the Committee on Ways and Means, and I remember several who wanted a 300 per cent increase in the duties on peanuts. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. May I make another suggestion?

Mr. MALBY. I would be glad to have the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say that we not only heard everybody who wanted to be heard, but we went out into the highways and byways and invited men to come in. I wrote a number of letters to distinguished gentlemen who had been writing upon the subject of the tariff for years, claiming that they knew all about the tariff and why it should be lowered. I asked them to come before the committee and make their statement, and they straightway began to make excuses, and did not appear.

Mr. DALZELL. Let me suggest that we subpœnaed parties to come before the committee.

Mr. MALBY. I think the country ought to know the difference in the methods employed in the revision of this tariff bill and those which were observed in the formulation of the Payne bill, because I am trying to lay the foundation by calling your attention to Democratic methods of the importance of the maintenance of this present Tariff Board, and I think I will be able to demonstrate that before I close.

It is certainly a remarkable thing that in a great country like ours, where we have a little matter of $21,000,000,000 of the people's money invested in manufacturing and $23,000,000,000 annual output and 8,000,000 people employed in that industry, when there was a general demand on the part of all the people interested for a hearing before the most popular, the most important committee in the House of Representatives, which rises to the sublime dignity of being the most important and far-reaching committee in any legislative body in the known world, a committee that ought to be a committee before whom the poorest as well as the richest may freely appear and say what he has to say and have it fairly and carefully considered—I say it is simply remarkable that they should not have had that opportunity.

We are the greatest manufacturing country, and have been for many years, on the whole earth. Therefore is not this a subject entitled to the most careful and nonpartisan consideration of any which comes before Congress, and is it not our fair duty to furnish ourselves and to furnish the people of this country with adequate information upon this most important subject. And when the committee of this House which is chargeable with legislation affecting these vast interests legislates for 90,000,000 people, is it not according to the rule of common decency and fairness that that committee should accord, as it has every time the Republicans have revised this schedule, to the people of this country the humble privilege of appearing before it and having a hearing with respect to those things in which we are all interested and which are so intimately tied up with the welfare of the people of this whole Nation? I desire to call the attention of the House particularly to these bills, which were acted upon in the dark, in a perfectly star-chamber way, when no one's interest was given the slightest possible consideration.

Fortunately for the people of this country, all of these bills had to be sent to our able and fearless President, who, true to the promises made to the people who trusted and elected him, vetoed them all, because he knew and was in possession of all these facts concerning the formulation of these bills, and realized that no consideration whatever had been given to the question of protection, but on the contrary, the Democracy, true to their idol, free trade, had only considered the subject from a free-trade and revenue standpoint, and even as to that had little or no information upon which to base an intelligent judgment.

Then came the final struggle to pass them over the President's veto, but again, fortunately for the people of our country, the Republican Members of this House, true to their principles and platform, defeated them in this final attempt to fasten upon the manufacturing industries of the country this most infamous of all tariff legislation, which has never been exceeded in all our history.

At this regular session of Congress most of these same bills, in substantially the same form, and again with little or no adequate consideration and no public hearings and in defiance of the findings of the Tariff Board as to the cost of production at home and abroad, have again been presented to this House and passed, and will undoubtedly receive the same consideration from President Taft as upon their former visit, if presented for his consideration.

I believe that the people of this country by a very large majority favor the Republican ideas of a protective tariff—that is, one which will fairly represent the difference between the cost of production here and in other countries.

The difficulty and contention has been, however, that this difference is impossible of ascertainment and that it has not found a place in any of our tariff bills. Great difficulties undoubtedly exist, but not such as are insurmountable or impossible of solution so as to answer all practical purposes.

Peary was not at the North Pole, but upon submitting his proofs, which clearly showed that he was not exactly there, he demonstrated that he was practically as near as anyone will ever get, and hence was very properly credited by scientists throughout the whole world with the successful accomplishment of this arduous task and was universally proclaimed as its original and only discoverer.

We can attain perfection in only a few things, but we may so closely approach it as to answer all practical purposes.

There has been some feeling on the part of the people that the tariff legislation passed in recent years did not fairly represent the difference between the cost of production here and abroad, and particularly that the tariff rates were higher than these differences would warrant, and this impression, whether well founded or not, and I think mostly unwarranted, has caused much criticism and dissatisfaction with our tariff legislation. Could this impression be removed, as it could be, and a bill framed along these lines, there can be no doubt but that it would meet with the general approval of a great majority of the citizens of this country.

While it is true that our tariff measures have not merited the criticisms that have been made against them, and it is true that much time and patience was given to their consideration, and that they are much more accurate than anything that has been offered to take their place, yet it was believed by President Taft and by Congress that even better results could be obtained by additional methods which would furnish to the President and to the Congress as well as to the country at large more definite information, and hence a Tariff Board was created for this especial purpose.

Before proceeding to a discussion of the results of their labors, let us pause long enough to inquire as to the personnel of this board and the uses to which their labors may be applied.

The tariff act of August 5, 1909, commonly known as the Payne-Aldrich bill, contains, in article 718, section 2, the following provision:

To secure information to assist the President in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this section—

That is, relating to the application of the maximum and minimum rates—

and the officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws, the President is hereby authorized to employ such persons as may be required.

Under the authority thus given, the President, by a letter dated September 14, 1909, appointed three persons to assist him in the manner contemplated by the act and designated them as constituting the Tariff Board. The persons so appointed were Prof. Henry C. Emery, professor of political economy in Yale University; Alvin H. Sanders, editor of the Breeders' Gazette, a leading agricultural journal, and for 30 years a student and writer on agricultural subjects; and James B. Reynolds, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and for some four years previous in charge of customs.

During the short session of the Sixty-first Congress bills were introduced to make the Tariff Board permanent, increasing its membership to five, and more clearly defining its powers. A bill was adopted by each House of Congress in slightly different form, but failed in final enactment during the last hours of the session.

President Taft, determined upon carrying out what he believed to be the wishes of Congress, appointed, on March 4, 1911, two additional members of the Tariff Board, thus raising its membership to five, selecting two Democrats, the three previous members of the board being understood to be of the Republican faith, thus putting into effect two of the most important provisions of the bill creating the Tariff Board, to which I have referred.

The two new members of the Tariff Board were Prof. Thomas W. Page, professor of economics in the University of Virginia and previously dean of the College of Commerce, University of California, and Hon. William M. Howard, for 14 years a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Georgia, who had given most distinguished service in that body.

It will thus be seen that in the selection of the Tariff Board the President was actuated by a sincere desire to secure the very best results by the selection of as able men as could be found in the whole country and at the same time make it nonpartisan.

The arduous character of the duties they were called upon to perform can not be overestimated and is little appreciated. In order, however, that the public may have some idea of the work which the Tariff Board has accomplished and its appreciation by others since its organization in March, 1911, I desire to call the attention of the House to a communication from the National Tariff Commission Association, addressed to Mr. John Candler Cobb, president of the National Tariff Commission Association, which reads as follows:

THE NATIONAL TARIFF COMMISSION ASSOCIATION,
New York, June 14, 1911.

Mr. JOHN CANDLER COBB,
President The National Tariff Commission Association.

DEAR SIR: Under the permission given at your request by President Taft, in his letter to you of May 4, 1911, the committee of our association selected to investigate and report on the organization, methods, and work of the Tariff Board submit the subjoined report.

The President's action was predicated on the concurrence of the Tariff Board, whose chairman, in a letter to the President, dated May 2, 1911, wrote:

"I beg to say that the Tariff Board are unanimous in welcoming this proposal, and that we shall be very glad indeed to have a committee of the National Tariff Commission Association make a thorough examination of our work and to offer them every facility for doing so."

Five members of our committee went to Washington in order to investigate the organization and work of the Tariff Board, with which most of them were previously more or less familiar, and devoted much additional time to reviewing the information thus obtained and in reaching conclusions thereon. We undertook the investigation with open minds, without previous comment or prejudice either for or against the Tariff Board and its methods. Our effort throughout was to ascertain facts. The conclusions reached represent the unanimous judgment of the committee.

Our investigation was so thorough and the information gathered so voluminous that our record of the results is necessarily somewhat extensive. To facilitate its use we have divided it into two parts, namely, the report, which summarizes the essential facts and states our conclusions thereon, and a supplement, which contains a historical review of the Tariff Board and gives the detailed information on which our conclusions are based. Those who desire a full understanding of the matter should read both papers.

The committee desires to record its appreciation of the cordial cooperation and assistance given to it throughout by each and all of the members of the Tariff Board. Unlimited opportunity was afforded us in our investigations of the work and methods of the board, the organization of the staff, the rates of salaries paid, and the kind and amount of all other expenses incurred. Every inquiry by us was responded to unreservedly and satisfactorily. We are justified, therefore, in stating that our conclusions are based upon a full and intelligent understanding of the facts.

Respectfully,

HENRY R. TOWNE, Chairman,
President Merchants' Association of New York, N. Y.

JOHN KIRBY, Jr.,
President National Association of Manufacturers, Ohio.

CHARLES M. JARVIS,
Vice President National Association of Manufacturers, Connecticut.

J. J. CULBERTSON,
President Southern Cottonseed Crushers' Association, Texas.

H. E. MILES,
Ex-President National Association of Implement and Vehicle Manufacturers, Texas.

FRANCIS T. SIMMONS,
Member Executive Council, Chicago Association of Commerce, Illinois.

The National Tariff Commission Association report, to which they refer in the above communication, is in part as follows:

Our committee was favorably impressed with the character, ability, and fitness of the members of the Tariff Board appointed by President Taft. We think it fortunate that the country has been able to secure for service in this new and untried field five men who, on the whole, are so well equipped for their duties, so impartial, and able in so short a time to organize the work on an effective basis. In this connection it is important to keep in mind that the functions of the Tariff Board are administrative and judicial; that its members were not selected as technical experts in any one field of industry; that the work of technical investigation will be done by many experts employed for this purpose by the board; and that the highest function of the board will consist in weighing the evidence thus gathered, in reaching sound conclusion thereon, and embodying all essential facts in its reports. In this respect the board acts as a court of first instance to review the evidence gathered by its experts and to pass judgment thereon. It thus fulfills the functions of a commission appointed by a court of justice to make findings of fact for the information of the court. Briefly, the motto of the board might be, "To furnish facts, not opinions."

For the technical investigations which the work involves the board utilizes the services of the trained experts, carefully selected with reference to their ability and past experience in each line of investigation taken up, and the experience thus far indicates that men possessing the requisite experience, skill, and knowledge can be secured on fair terms. Members of our commission passed in review every important employee of the board, except those absent on field work, investigated their duties, ascertained the salaries paid, and thus informed themselves generally concerning the business organization and methods thus far developed. The resulting impression was unexpectedly satisfactory and fully justifies the statement that the administration of the work of the Tariff Board is on a sound, economical, and businesslike basis, which does credit to the members of the board and demonstrates conclusively their fitness to perform the executive functions which their duties involve. Their equal fitness to perform intelligently and impartially the judicial function, which constitutes the other and greater part of their duty, may be judged from the two reports which they have thus far rendered.

Our committee, although previously familiar with the subject, was deeply impressed by the immense complexity and scope of the work which the Tariff Board has undertaken, and also by the progress already made in creating an organization for its effective conduct, and by the volume of work accomplished in the past eight months, or since October 1, 1910, when the board was first effectively organized. The actual achievement during this short period justifies the prediction that the work on other important schedules can be completed in similar periods or less, and on the simpler schedules in proportionally shorter time. When the initial work has once been completed the continuing work of keeping it revised and corrected to date will be relatively easy and simple.

Commenting on one of the issued reports, an official of the Royal Imperial Ministry of Commerce of Austria, regarded in Europe as a leading authority on tariff questions, says:

"The report is excellent and in line with the latest theory, and I know of no European publication which so correctly interprets the most important features of the question of commercial policy as does your report on the paper industry. This is a very good beginning, and I already see that you will leave all European government departments far behind in the publication of model reports on questions of commercial policy. This report will attract great attention in Europe."

The observations of our commission confirm and justify these favorable comments. We believe the reports of the Tariff Board as they are issued will prove to be of great value not only to Congress and the executive departments of the Government but also to American producers in all fields of industry, collectively and individually. We predict that this opinion will be indorsed by the latter as rapidly as they have opportunity to receive and study the reports relating to their respective lines of industry.

It is earnestly to be hoped that at an early date Congress will enact a law making the Tariff Board a permanent part of the machinery of the Federal Government, and in so doing Congress will make provision whereby the board shall on request report directly to Congress or to either House thereof, concerning any matter within its field of investigation and concerning which its work has been completed or sufficiently advanced to enable it to respond to such a call.

In conclusion our committee find that the Tariff Board is composed of able, impartial, and earnest men, who are devoting their energies unreservedly to the work before them; that the staff has been carefully selected for the work in view; is efficiently organized and directed, and includes a number of exceptionally competent technical experts; that the scale of salaries is reasonable—indeed, moderate—and that all other expenditures are closely scrutinized and appear to be equally reasonable; that the work of the board, vast and intricate in detail, is already highly organized, well systematized, and running smoothly; and that Congress and the people can now await the completion of that work with entire confidence that it is progressing as rapidly as consistent with proper thoroughness and that it will amply justify all of the time and expense which it entails. We believe that the value of the work, when completed, will be so great and so evident as to leave remaining no single doubt as to the expediency of maintaining it as a permanent function of the Government for the benefit of all the people.

It will be recalled that this investigation was made by the representatives of the greatest commercial body in this country, if not in the whole world, intensely interested in having this work on which the future prosperity of the whole country was so dependent, accurately and well done; that it especially requested the President to permit them to make this investigation of the work of the Tariff Board, and the manner in which this committee was received and the opportunities offered for investigation are set forth in the report above quoted.

This, then, is the estimate of the Tariff Board by this intelligent and nonpartisan commission which officially represents the manufacturing industry of the entire country, after a thorough investigation of its work, and to which nothing can be added.

The Appropriations Committee undertook to inform itself as to the character and extent of the work performed by this board and summoned its members before it. The statements made by its chairman, Mr. Emery, were most instructive and show conclusively not only its method of procedure and accuracy, but also that the estimate made of the work of the Tariff Board by the National Tariff Commission committee is warranted in every particular.

I quote in part from the hearings:

Mr. EMERY. We have shown what rates would equalize the difference in the cost of production, but we have never in the way of a formal meeting for that purpose discussed at all the question of any tariff rate, either in the present tariff or in any proposed rates, with a view to determine what it should be.

Mr. SHERLEY. In other words, you have never undertaken to make any recommendations?

Mr. EMERY. Not in the slightest.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then your advisement of the President, under the law, has consisted in presenting to him certain information in the way of data, without giving any conclusions of the board in connection therewith?

Mr. EMERY. Absolutely.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do you consider that that represents the scope of the board's authority?

Mr. EMERY. Absolutely.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do you consider that that represents the scope it should have?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERLEY. In point of efficiency?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. After the President indicated the particular schedule he desired, was it left to be determined by the board?

Mr. EMERY. You mean as to the line of inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EMERY. That has been left absolutely to the board. The President simply said, "Give me the information on this subject," and he left it to us to determine the whole line of inquiry. The President instructed us to find the absolute facts, so far as it was possible to do in relation to each industry, regarding prices, the relative cost of production here and abroad, the condition of competition between the American producer and the foreign producer, the relation between cost at home and the price charged at home, between the price charged by the manufacturer and the price charged to the consumer, and to report those facts fully and completely, whatever they were, regardless of who was affected by the publication of this knowledge. * * * We were to find out all we could about a given industry, and it was not to be prepared for use of any one person or for the use of a person who had a particular object in mind, but was to be prepared so that those facts would be as useful as possible either for Congress or for the President, either for a protectionist or a free trader to understand the existing conditions in the industry as it is.

Mr. MALBY. There are one or two questions that I would like to ask Mr. Emery. I did not, perhaps, quite understand the import of one or two questions asked by the chairman or by Mr. SHERLEY relative to the gathering of the detailed facts with respect to any industry, and, when collected, as to whether another body of men, rather than the present board, considering the same facts which you had before you, could in honesty and fairness come to any other conclusion with respect to cost than you did?

Mr. EMERY. No, sir; I do not believe it possible.

Mr. MALBY. That is to say, your findings are based upon the facts found by you in the course of your examination?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; and I am confident that any five men who would check the data we had would come to the same conclusion that we came to with regard to cost.

Mr. MALBY. The thing I want to develop clearly for the record is that your conclusions were deduced from a certain state of facts ascertained by you after a careful, patient, and honest investigation?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; our conclusions as to the facts.

Mr. MALBY. And in making your investigations in the various mills or manufacturing establishments, the commission had previously laid down certain rules and regulations for the guidance and direction of the employees of the commission, as to the scope and character of the investigation demanded?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MALBY. And these rules were uniform and applied to each one of the investigators sent out?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MALBY. Several European countries maintain boards having for their purpose the performing of functions somewhat similar to those performed by your board for the furnishing of tariff data?

Mr. EMERY. Many of them do. Practically all of them have a permanent body of officials studying the relation of the tariff to industries. Japan has just established a new permanent tariff commission.

Mr. MALBY. And the boards in these countries are permanent organizations?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; they have nothing to do with politics and go on from year to year.

The foregoing questions and answers clearly indicate the attitude of the President with reference to the board and its work, as well as the fact that the board confined its investigations to the ascertainment of legitimate facts connected with the industries under investigation, regardless of results.

The work of the board, in addition to the investigation of the foreign tariff, has been divided into two different branches of inquiry—first, the preparation of reports, which have included analyses of existing tariff schedules, with a description of each article, its character, and its place in the industry, together with all the necessary statistical, descriptive, and historical material regarding each article necessary for tariff purposes; second, much more elaborate reports involving an investigation through expert agents of the board into the cost of production here and abroad, together with a large mass of information as to the conditions of competition between this and other countries. These reports have been much more elaborate and difficult and have involved the use of a very much larger force of experts. Under the reports of the first character referred to above the board has completed reports on Schedule A, chemicals; Schedule B, pottery and earthenware; Schedule I, cotton; Schedule K, wool and manufactures of. It has partially completed reports on Schedule C, iron and steel; Schedule E, sugar; Schedule J, jute and linen; Schedule L, silk and manufactures of; and Schedule N, leather. Under the second class of reports the board has completed Schedule I, cotton; Schedule K, wool and manufactures of; Schedule M, pulp and paper; and also a report on the relative value of farm products in Canada and the United States.

All the findings of facts reported are unanimously agreed to, indicating conclusively the nonpartisan character of the work of the board.

Attention is called to the fact that this work is not simply for the information of Congress, but for the whole country, for both the manufacturer and consumer alike, and so far as it has already been published it has shown by the unanimous testimony of both importers and dealers on the one hand and manufacturers on the other, that the investigation was practical and thorough and reveals the real facts regarding the conditions of the respective industries.

Furthermore, by the testimony of one, at least, of the leading experts in Europe this Tariff Board has been able during its brief existence to put itself at the head of all similar bodies in the entire world.

I quote as follows from Mr. Richard Schuller, a distinguished member of the Austrian tariff board of more than 20 years' service:

ROYAL IMPERIAL MINISTRY OF COMMERCE,
Vienna, March 18, 1912.

* * * It (the wool report) is an excellent standard work. The Tariff Board has come within a very short time to the head of all the similar boards established a long time since in the other countries. It is really true that no legislative body has ever had presented to it a better report on a tariff question. It will be also entirely impossible not to take your results in mind in proceeding to a revision of the tariff. It was a great mistake to stop the work of the board, and it would soon prove necessary to reestablish it. * * *

RICHARD SCHULLER.

It will be seen that although reports have been completed upon only three schedules the work has progressed so far upon others that to discontinue it at the present time would be to stop it when it is only about half completed and thus lose the benefits of the work already done and paid for, and at a time when contemplated tariff legislation makes its continuance most necessary and desirable.

Preliminary work has been done, as we have seen, on a good many schedules. The methods of investigation have been tried out and thoroughly tested. An experienced force has been organized, and the work on the remaining schedules is far less complicated than that on the woolen and cotton schedules, which have already been completed. As a result, these schedules can be completed much more rapidly than when the work was in the first experimental stages. Bills have, so far, passed one or both Houses of Congress affecting the cotton schedule, the woolen schedule, chemical, and paper and pulp schedules, sugar and iron and steel schedules, reports on all of which have been submitted by the Tariff Board except on the iron and steel and sugar schedules. An investigation of the sugar schedule is now under way, and preliminary work has been done on this as well as on the metal schedule, and in view of the action taken by the House and the Senate on the sugar schedule its importance to Congress and the country can not be overestimated.

The entire work of the Tariff Board could probably be completed within the next two or three years and kept up to date thereafter with a very small force of employees and at a small expense.

It may be said, then, that there is no sound basis for the objection to the continuance of the work of the Tariff Board, and there are reasons without number why it should be continued. I submit that the labor which has been performed so faithfully and well and upon such a high plane as this merits more consideration than that a great committee, holding the purse strings of the Government, should simply dismiss it without an appropriation at all, locked up and left to starve. I do not want to be unkind in my remarks, and I probably could not if I wanted to, but it strikes me that failing to make an appropriation for the Tariff Board is consistent and in strict conformity with their determination to stop all avenues of information which lead to true light. When you are making a tariff bill the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee are told to keep away; the country is told that it is none of their business; and by refusing a reasonable appropriation to carry on the Tariff Board you have said to the country that the Democracy prefers darkness rather than light. [Applause.]

I read over a portion of the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD], made the other day, and his criticisms of the Tariff Board seemed to be based upon his unsupported charge that the report of the Tariff Board on the cotton schedule did not, according to his idea, contain evidence of its absolute correctness. Perhaps it is not absolutely correct in every particular, but had he treated the report fairly, as did the Tariff Board in making it in a nonpartisan manner, his conclusions undoubtedly would have been different. I believe that the people of this country will accept the judgment of those who have examined and approved of it as a business proposition rather than political, than to adopt the statement from one who advocates a tariff for revenue only and not for protection. As an evidence of the correctness of their reports let me call attention to the fact that a company which was doing an $8,000,000 business was examined by the board, which proceeded to estimate by the use of its tables of costs the actual total cost of manufacture for the year to the company. The figures checked within $8.33 of the total amount of money expended by the company in manufacture during the year for which the Tariff Board made the estimate. In another case, by the same method of computation, the variation amounted to only $332. In every case the report shows that the companies examined agree, after a careful examination, that the figures given by the Tariff Board in its report on the cotton schedule, and the cost of manufacture, and so forth, are correct. In the face of these facts the country will determine whether my colleague from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] is correct in his criticisms or whether the findings of the Tariff Board are for all practical purposes absolutely correct.

Our Democratic friends will have to find some other excuse for not continuing this board than that they are incompetent, or that the country does not want them, or that the task which has been assigned to them is an impossible one.

I believe that too high a tariff, one in excess of the difference in cost of production here and abroad, is unjust to the consumer, and one lower is unjust to the manufacturer and laborer. A tariff representing less than the difference in cost would invariably result in either lowering the wages of the employee to the point where the cost at home and abroad would again have to be equalized or the importation of foreign-made goods would be inevitable, bringing about the complete destruction of our home industries, for a tariff which does not equal the difference between the cost at home and abroad is no better than no tariff at all so far as the effect upon our protected industries is concerned, for the results would be the same in either case.

It matters very little to a 6-foot man whether he is thrown into 7 feet of water a thousand miles from shore, or whether he went down with the Titanic 10,000 feet below the surface of the sea, for the one in the 7 feet of water might struggle for a while, but in the end he must necessarily yield to the inevitable and find his resting place beneath the waves.

Why shut out the light when the information is at hand and the demand well-nigh universal? Can the Democracy, who are now in control of the purse strings of the National Treasury, find justification in the cry of economy, which is seldom practiced by them and so often neglected when the public interest would be promoted by its observance? Hundreds of thousands of dollars have already been appropriated and expended by them, hundreds of thousands more have been authorized to be expended, since they came into power in this House about a year ago, in a perfect multitude of investigations, and without one single tangible reform or economy resulting therefrom. Can they now afford to refuse a moderate appropriation to continue the work of the Tariff Board, which is so much needed and demanded by the people of the whole country outside of these legislative halls in correctly solving this great national question of tariff legislation, and which is so highly appreciated both at home and abroad? Upon them rests the responsibility for the success or failure of this appropriation. You may succeed in temporarily shutting off the light, but enough has already been seen by the people of this country to convince them of the utility and necessity for this information, and when the Republican Party is restored to power in November the good work will be completed and tariff bills formulated along those lines which will, as in the beginning, serve to support the Government and protect our manufactures and their employees from that competition from other lands which would reduce their pleasant and happy homes to hovels and turn their holidays to drudgery. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] 30 minutes.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may have the attention of the House and particularly of the committee which reported this bill, because if I do not get their attention the people in my district and my State are going to suffer a great injury.

There are about seven large national parks in the West. The Mount Rainier National Park will, I think, be conceded by all to be of equal importance with that of any other park. In point of attendance of visitors it ranked third last year, and if the Government road in the park through the reserve, to which I am going to address my attention, is maintained, it is only a question of one or two years when in point of visitors the Mount Rainier National Park will exceed that of any of these national parks.

It is one of the most beautiful natural parks in the world; it surrounds one of the grandest mountains in the world. There is not a stretch of mountains in Switzerland that affords more beautiful or magnificent scenery than that contained in the Mount Rainier National Park which surrounds Mount Tacoma.

The Government established this park a number of years ago. Shortly afterwards it determined to construct a road within it. An appropriation was made to that end. The Government engineers went to the park and commenced surveying a road up the side of the mountain from a point that is known as the Hot Springs. After the Government had spent much time in surveying this road it finally located one from the Hot Springs up the mountain side to the eternal snows, at a grade of 4 per cent. The road as located, in point of engineering feat, is equal to that of any road constructed in the United States, and when completed no other mountain road in this country or in Switzerland will surpass it in point of scenery. No transcontinental road that has been constructed across the Rocky Mountains displays better engineering skill than this mountain road. The engineers then undertook to locate a road from Hot Springs in the park to connect the proposed Government road, as mentioned, with the county road of Pierce County at the edge of Mount Rainier National Forest Reserve.

Several years before the park was established and before the Government had extended its surveys up to and into the boundaries of the park some settlers had squatted along the Nisqually River. Each settler took up a quarter section along the line of this river up to what is now the boundaries of Mount Rainier National Park. After considerable surveying the Government engineers found that the shortest and most direct route for the proposed road to connect with the county road and one that would cost the least to build and at the same time give the Government the grade it desired was over the land of these settlers. For these reasons the Government decided to locate the road on this line and solicited the settlers to grant a right of way over their land. The settlers deeded to the Government the right of way over their land. Prior to this time these settlers and the county of Pierce had constructed a road that was sufficient for all purposes for the settlers. The Government also asked the county of Pierce to consent to the construction of the proposed Government road, as it crossed and recrossed the county road in a number of places. If the Government had built this road upon its own land, the road would have been nearly twice as long and in every way less desirable.

The objection that the members of the committee have made to the appropriation is based on the grounds that the Government ought not to construct a road on private property. They overlook the fact that this road was located and constructed by the Government over the land of these settlers not for the benefit of the settlers in any wise, but for the benefit of the Government, in order that it might secure a right for the grade it desired and also save much in cost of construction of the road. The road through the forest reserve is about 3½ miles long. The road through the reserve, as constructed, runs in a generally easterly direction. The Government owns forest land on either side of this 3½ miles of road through the fores reserve. It is the very choicest of timberland. It is of immense value. The timber that the Government owns on either side of this road for 10 miles back is easily worth many, many millions of dollars, all of which is nonassessable and from which the county of Pierce and State of Washington get not a penny of taxes.

The tax on the forest land at the rate and on the valuation given like timberland in Pierce County for 10 miles on either side in one year would more than macadamize this road.

The road as originally constructed was sufficient for the travel for the first two or three years the park was open, but the travel has increased enormously during the past two years, and, in addition to that, it has been used by the purchasers of timber from the Government in hauling out lumber and shingles that have been manufactured on Government land. A mill has been built and the Government is getting a large amount each year from the sale of timber, which is hauled over the entire length of this 3½ miles of road. This is hard hauling, and during the rainy months of the last winter season has practically destroyed the road.

If the road is not improved as I suggest, no one will be able to enter the park this year except on foot, and the Government will lose the revenue both from the people who enter the park and the sale of its timber.

Congressmen SULZER and MURDOCK were over this road last fall. They will tell you the frightful condition it was in then, but it is far worse now by reason of the heavy hauling which I have mentioned. I informed the Commercial Club of Tacoma in March that it was possible that the committee would not make any recommendation for an appropriation for this road. This aroused the people of the whole State of Washington, and they have deluged me with telegrams showing the frightful condition of the road and the urgent need of an appropriation.

I will read you a few of these telegrams and print as a part of my remarks many others:

Hon. STANTON WARBURTON, M. C.,
Congressional Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Immediate financial aid must be given to repairing Mount Tacoma Road within Rainier Forest Reserve or success mountain season impossible. Road worse condition this season than ever; cut up by unusually heavy hauling. Pierce County hitherto made repairs. Government should make adequate repairs and improvements.

TACOMA DAILY LEDGER.

Hon. STANTON WARBURTON,
Washington, D. C.:

Would not be destroyed every year by ordinary hauling. We do not feel that Pierce County should be called upon every year to repair the road through Government property. Please do your best to secure appropriation for substantial and permanent repairs.

TORGER PETERSON,
Chairman Board Pierce County Commissioners.

The many thousands of tourists who will visit this section the coming season will be disappointed in their efforts to visit and see the beauties of the wonderful Mount Rainier National Park, because the condition of the road through the forest reserve extending to the limits of the park make the latter absolutely inaccessible at present.

Bottom dropped out Government road in national forest. Bottom will drop out tourist travel to mountain unless road is fixed quick. Pierce County gone limit in assistance to mountain road. Feels Government should complete work. Please use your best efforts in Congress for right kind of assistance.

H. C. NUTT.

There is no way to enter the park except through this Government road. All the travel into the park is over this road. It can be reached in no other way. Last year over 10,000 people went in over this road in a space of about 45 days.

It is expected by those who operate the hotels and camps in the park that the travel into the park this year would be from 15,000 to 20,000 people. If this road is not made passable not 500 people will be able to enter the park. Last year the Government received $8,000 from licenses, and so forth, from people who entered the park over this road. This year it would take in from this source from $12,000 to $15,000, if this road is improved as I suggest. If the road is not improved as I suggest the Government will lose not less than $10,000 to $15,000, which it ought to have and which would enable the Government to make still further improvements in the park. The mill corporation which is purchasing timber from the Government will have to close down and go out of business unless this road is improved. The Government will lose from this source $10,000 and upward each year. So, if you look at it strictly from a business point of view it is wholly indefensible to refuse the appropriation. It will not only prevent people from using this park as they desire to, and ought to be permitted to, but the Government will lose an income this coming year of not less than $20,000. So I ask this appropriation not alone because it is just and right that we have it, but because it would be a pecuniary loss to the Government itself. This appropriation can not be refused, then, on the ground of economy; it can not be refused because people do not make use of the park, as I will shortly show.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CULLOP). Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes; I will.

Mr. PAGE. My recollection is, as a member of the committee, that the gentleman introduced a bill and appeared, I believe, before the subcommittee and asked for an appropriation of $30,000 for the construction of this road?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes.

Mr. PAGE. Is this proposed road inside or outside of the national park?

Mr. WARBURTON. It is within the forest reserve. It is part of a national park road.

Mr. PAGE. That is my recollection of the testimony taken before the committee, and it is also my recollection that within this 3 miles of forest road which is sought to be improved the land has been preempted and is in private possession and does not belong to the Government, in spite of the fact that it is included within the bounds of a forest reserve; and the gentleman in point of fact is asking the Committee on Appropriations, or did ask the Committee on Appropriations, and proposes to ask the House, to appropriate $30,000 to build a road over private property.

Mr. WARBURTON. I went over that a moment ago, and I am glad to go over it again. Now, I want the gentleman's attention——

Mr. PAGE. I am listening to the gentleman.

Mr. WARBURTON. I want to call your attention to this map of the State of Washington which discloses the location of the Rainier National Forest Reserve and the Mount Rainier National Park, which you will observe is wholly within the forest reserve. The road constructed by Pierce County through the forest reserve is along this general line [pointing to map] touching the forest reserve at about this point. You will observe the road through the forest reserve extends about 3½ miles through the reserve before it reaches the park. It will be remembered this road was built by the Government to make the national park accessible and is, in fact, an integral part of the national park road. You will observe by looking at the map that the land lying immediately north and south of this road for many many miles is in the forest reserve and, I will say, is the choicest land.

You will readily understand how unfair it would be to ask the State of Washington to construct a mountain road through this park for the benefit of the Government. If the Government is going to own and use this property and sell it and get the benefit of it, it ought, in all fairness, to construct the road. The Mount Rainier Forest Reserve, together with the Mount Rainier National Park, have an area of over 2,800 square miles. Together they are nearly three times as large as the State of Rhode Island, over half as large as the State of Maryland, and one-third as large as the State of Massachusetts or New Jersey. They contain over 2,800 sections of land. The road through the forest reserve runs over about five quarter sections of land lying practically end to end or about 1¼ square miles out of this over 2,800 square miles.

Now, you are suggesting that Pierce County and the State of Washington, because one twenty-eighth hundredth part of it is privately owned, construct 3 miles of expensive macadamized road, which is a part of the park road and which is through Government land.

This land within the park reserve is the most valuable land in the State of Washington. It is worth more than a like area of farm lands either in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, or Connecticut, or Maryland, improved as they are.

This 1,800,000 acres of land would sell on the market tomorrow for more than a like number of acres in any of the States I have mentioned, outside of the towns and municipalities. You have some idea of what the taxes would be derived from this land if owned privately. If the Government is going to continue to hold this land and ultimately sell the timber thereon and take the proceeds, it certainly is nothing but fair that it should repair a necessary road for the benefit of the people who go to the national park and necessarily have to pass over the road.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman consider the park a benefit to the community?

Mr. WARBURTON. Certainly; I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. You consider it also a benefit to the community to have people visiting the park?

Mr. WARBURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then by what process of reasoning do you make the burden of maintaining all of the roads and the tax to build roads that confer a benefit upon the State and the community fall upon the United States Government?

Mr. WARBURTON. I am very glad the gentleman asked that question, and I will come to that in a few moments. Pierce County and the State of Washington have done something for the park that no other part of the country has done. It has done more than any other county, State, or country has done. Where this road enters the park it is 50 miles from the city of Tacoma. We needed no roads except the ones we had already constructed, except for a fine road to the park. In the last five years Pierce County has built a road solely for the purpose of this park that cost between $250,000 and $300,000 in cash. When this season opens in July every mile of that road that needs macadamizing or paving will be paved or macadamized. We are spending $50,000 this spring to finish macadamizing the last of that 50 miles of road.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman made the statement that the county in which Tacoma is located and that is adjacent to this park had done for the national park what no other community had done.

Mr. WARBURTON. That is correct.

Mr. PAGE. Does the gentleman seriously mean that his county has expended this $200,000 in the construction of a macadamized road from the edge of this forest reservation for the benefit of the park?

Mr. WARBURTON. Absolutely for the benefit of the park and the resultant benefit by the people using the park, and they come from all parts of the United States.

Mr. PAGE. Let me ask the gentleman, on the other hand, was not that road constructed by the county or by the city of Tacoma for the benefit that would come to the county and city of Tacoma because of the road and the number of people who would come there to visit the park?

Mr. WARBURTON. Certainly so; but we are the only county I know of that has built a macadamized road to a park 50 miles away, and I think that when we spend $5 to the Government's $1 in making the road, at least we ought to be treated as well as you treat any other park. You have not done that. You gave $50,000 to Glacier Park this year.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman assumes that the building of that road over private property was the result of a great deal of magnanimity on the part of the people who owned the ground. In point of fact, I have never known a community on earth that would not be perfectly willing to give the ground for building a road that would produce the advantages to the community that this road did. Now, the gentleman's argument is like that of every gentleman that has a Government institution within the boundaries of his district—that whenever it comes to the burden of the institution they say Uncle Sam should bear it because it is national, and whenever it comes to the benefits they want them all.

Mr. WARBURTON. I do not do that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to suggest another thing. The gentleman is aware that there is a provision carried in the Agriculture appropriation bill for the building of roads through forest reserves. Why should we appropriate for parks and for building roads through forest reserves or through private property?

Mr. WARBURTON. One amendment I am going to offer, which is desired by the Agricultural Department and the Secretary of the Interior, that this road be made a part of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is desired by the Agricultural Department, of course, to come and get out of Congress all the money it can for building roads and then turn over to some other bureau all it can so as to have that much more money.

Mr. WARBURTON. I may be dull of comprehension, but I know the conditions out there, and I know that if we had the assessed value of that land on either side of this forest reserve for one single year in taxes we could get enough out of it to macadamize the road. If we were getting the taxes out of it, I would say let the people build the road, but we are not.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARBURTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that the local authorities have built a road up to within 3 miles of the park?

Mr. WARBURTON. Up to the edge of the forest reserve.

Mr. MANN. Between the end of the road is a part of the forest reserve?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And the Agricultural Department has jurisdiction over it?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman made any effort to have that provision put in the Agriculture appropriation bill?

Mr. WARBURTON. I did, over in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. There is not much satisfaction in being in the fix that the gentleman is where he has a road built up to one point and built up to another and having a quarrel over the space in between.

Mr. WARBURTON. There has never been one before this time.

Mr. MANN. But there has been no road there.

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes; the Government has already constructed the road, but it has become impassable.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman state how much land is owned privately on each side, immediately on either side?

Mr. WARBURTON. Within 5 miles on either side there is not one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not the road over ground that was originally privately owned?

Mr. WARBURTON. There is no private land on the left of the road or on the right of it; it is all Government land. Here is one——

Mr. SHERLEY. But it goes over property privately owned?

Mr. WARBURTON. It runs over about five quarter sections lying along the river. Now, on either side of these quarter sections for 20 miles is Government property. Now, if we had 5 miles of private property on either side of the road, we would construct the road. But the Government owns it for 10 to 50 miles on either side, and if we owned property for 10 miles on either side we could pave the road with the taxes that would come from it in one year.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to get at the facts, because I can not carry in my mind all the items relating to these different projects. Is it not a fact that the road itself—I am not talking about quarter sections, but the road itself—is built over mostly privately owned property.

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes; but the right of way has been ceded the Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not a fact that at the present time alongside the most of the road is privately owned property?

Mr. WARBURTON. There is just that one succession of quarter sections, as I state. The property beyond that on either side is not privately owned.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am talking about property right next to the road.

Mr. WARBURTON. Suppose this [pointing to the desk] was a forest reservation, and suppose by some accident four or five quarter sections of land extended into it and the Government needed a road which it desired for the public, would the gentleman ask us to build the road?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARBURTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Referring to where the road is, whether on private property or not, can the State build the road over this property?

Mr. WARBURTON. No.

Mr. MANN. Why not?

Mr. WARBURTON. Because it is Government-owned property. The Government wants to keep the road so as to be able to protect the forest reserve and also the park. I have letters from the Secretary stating that it is desired to have it placed under the jurisdiction of the park in order to police it and as a matter of fire protection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the first question which would arise, it seems to me, would be whether it is properly the duty of the General Government to build the road or properly the duty of the local authorities to build the road. If it should be determined that it is the duty of the General Government, in the interest of the General Government, to build the road, of course it does not make much difference whether it is forest reserve or private property. But if the local authorities ought to build the road, we could very easily grant them permission to do it.

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is what I was going to add. Has the gentleman ever asked for permission?

Mr. WARBURTON. I have not.

Mr. SHERLEY. Are the people the gentleman represents willing now to undertake the building of it?

Mr. WARBURTON. No; I do not think so. I am going to appeal to this House and ask them if they think it fair that we should do it. I do not think it is fair.

Mr. MANN. After all, there is quite a question of principle involved. Here is a national park that it is to the interest of the Government to make available and entertaining for visitors. On the other hand, visitors who go to the park are a distinct financial advantage to the residents of the locality.

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And the question is whether the Government ought to construct the roads outside of the park in order to induce visitors to go there or whether the local people ought to build the road outside of the park and let the Government use its funds to construct a road inside the park. A great deal more is involved than this mere proposition, because that applies to all parks.

Mr. WARBURTON. I agree with the gentleman absolutely, where it is clearly outside of the Government property. For instance, if there was a place a mile wide or 2 miles wide, privately owned property, so that you could tax it and make the owners pay, all well and good, but it is essentially through Government property.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman speaks of local property. Of course it is certain that in this case, for instance, the privately owned property can not build the road, but that applies to almost every case where you want to build a first-class road. The question is whether it is the duty of the State to help build the road, whether it is to the interest of the State to make it easily accessible for visitors to reach this park, which, as the gentleman says, is one of the ornaments of the Nation, and invite visitors to go there and spend their money in the State in that way, rather than to leave it inaccessible.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, further, that we are in very great need of money for widening the road within the park. The road is dangerous. I took President Taft over the road last year and was very severely criticized for it by all of the eastern papers, as some gentlemen will remember, because it was said by using this road we were endangering the life of the President. That park will be closed this year unless something is done immediately.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman wants my opinion, I think our present park system is entirely a mistake. The gentleman told the whole story a moment ago when he referred to the railroads advertising. The park is advertised simply by a railroad in order to help that railroad. Here a railroad comes to it. Then there are circulars and folders sent out to exploit that place that they may get the benefit of the railroad traffic. Then certain hotels, certain men running a line of busses, or certain automobile owners proceed also to boost that particular park that they may get the benefit of the travel which may come in. Now, what is the result? The result is to-day we are spending an altogether disproportionate sum of money on our national parks considering the resultant benefits to the Government and the American people. Last year the Yellowstone Park had 23,000 visitors during the year. Why, on one Sunday more people will go out to the Zoo Park outside of Washington here than will go throughout the entire year or through three years of the park which the gentleman is talking about; and what I am in favor of and what I am going to offer on the floor of this House is a provision by which we will charge a fee, not for the running of busses or automobiles, but a fee from every person who goes into the park; not a fee sufficient to bear all the burden of maintaining the park, but a fee that will bear part of the burden, in order that these peculiar beneficiaries of the national parks may bear some burden instead of the rest of the people.

Mr. WARBURTON. I do not disagree with the gentleman.

A MEMBER. How large a fee?

Mr. SHERLEY. My own idea is the fee ought to be at least a dollar a head. For instance, in the Yellowstone Park we would not keep a single man from going there and it would give $23,000 more money to put on the roads. At present our system is without uniformity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WARBURTON. I would like to have more time.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman require?

Mr. WARBURTON. I do not know; it depends upon how much I can obtain.

Mr. CANNON. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes additional.

Mr. WARBURTON. I agree with you. I am perfectly willing that they should be charged a dollar a head. Now, I have here a picture of this road, the one I want repaired. The Government has built 11 miles of roads in the reserve and park that it permits automobiles to use. Six hundred automobiles entered the park last year, and for the use of that road and this kind of a road they paid $5 for each automobile. It is such a road that when I took Congressman SULZER and Congressman MURDOCK up there I could hardly force a 60-horsepower car through it. It is a road that is not fit to drive a drove of razorback hogs over.

Mr. SHERLEY. They not only pay the $5 for going over the razorback-hog road of which the gentleman speaks, but they also pay it for the privilege of going over the other roads in the parks.

Mr. WARBURTON. In other words, they pay $5 for riding over a Government road 11 miles and return. I say if you are going to charge us $5 for the privilege of riding over a road that you ought to give us something that we can drive over.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the equity of the thing is that every dollar of this is turned back into improvements.

Mr. WARBURTON. If this road was built you would get out of it, instead of an income of $8,000, an income of $15,000 or $20,000.

If you will give us a road in the reserve and park equal to the road we have constructed for 50 miles, instead of 10, we will have 50,000 or 60,000 people within the next three years, because it is the most attractive road in the world. It is the only road in the world where you can leave tidewater and go to the eternal snows in five hours' time. I have here 50 telegrams—telegrams from men like the president and vice president of the Milwaukee road, the Northern Pacific road, from every club in the State of Washington, from every organization of any character that is organized for promoting the interest of the country in which it is located—urging the appropriation. There is not a dollar of money requested by any locality that has been granted it or will be granted that is needed as much as this appropriation. I do not think there is a locality which has the benefit of a park in its community that has done one-half of what my country has done toward improving a road to the park and making it accessible. Last year we spent $50,000 in macadamizing this road. This year we are spending another $50,000 in macadamizing the road, and it does not seem like it is much to ask the Government much more to put $30,000 on the end of it on its own property and its own reservation.

Now, the people, as I said, paid nearly $8,000 last year for the use of this park. There was appropriated last year $3,000. The Sequoia National Park last year, for which it is proposed to appropriate this year $15,800, had total receipts of $336 as against our $8,000. You propose to appropriate $50,000 for the Glacier National Park, and last year the recipts were something like $780 against our $8,000. This year you propose to appropriate for the Yellowstone $75,500. Its receipts were $23,000 as against our $8,000. Now, I do not think we are asking anything but what is fair between man and man. I think it is a moral obligation that rests upon the Government to keep this road in repair. If it ultimately should develop that the Government wants to return this land to the county, all well and good. We will take the road and keep it in repair. But I will venture the assertion that that will not be done—that is, it will not be done unless over the protest of the Agricultural Department and the Department of the Interior. A number of them have told me, for instance, Assistant Secretary Thompson and a subordinate in the Agricultural Department, that it ought to remain in the control of the Government, because running through the park as it does and through the forest they want to control it and they want the power to police this road to prevent forest fires, and so forth, and they ought to have it. The Government has given the Yellowstone Park $2,000,000 in the last 15 years. If so, I think it could give us $35,000 to improve this road.

As I have stated, the people of my county have expended about $300,000 in building a road to make the park accessible. I think we have actually spent five dollars in constructing a road to the park where one has been expended by the Government within it. We certainly have built 50 miles of splendid road, macadamized where needed, while the Government has constructed within the forest reserve and in the park less than 25 miles, and most of it is in a deplorable condition, the worst part being within the forest reserve, which is wholly impassable. If the Government would macadamize all the road within the forest reserve as well as within the park it then would have a road not at all superior to the Pierce County road as it now exists, and if this were done it would only be building a road equal to that of the county in quality and only one-third as long. I think when my county builds 3 miles of road to the park where the Government has built 1 mile in the park we have done our share. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. WARBURTON. I will ask permission to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Hon. STANTON WARBURTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Tourists to Mount Tacoma will be absolutely unable to use present roadway unless some appropriation and help is secured from the Government to put in repair and proper condition the roadway from the reserve limits to the entrance to the national park. Heavy travel this winter has completely ruined the road, and condition needs urgent attention. Over 10,000 tourists entered the park last year and number increases largely every season. We urge you to bend every effort to secure necessary appropriation. We will appreciate your efforts.

ST. PAUL & TACOMA LUMBER CO.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, at the request of my colleague, who has charge of the time on this side, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest to the debate here, and I can not help but think that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is inclined not to treat the people of the West with that degree of fairness which he would demand for his own State if one-fourth of his territory was taken up in forest reserves, Indian reservations, national parks, and things of that character.

As I sat here and heard him making his remarks regarding the railroad people taking an interest in this road-building question I thought that this is not entirely selfish on the part of those railroads. They have gone into that mountainous country at an expense of $30,000, $40,000, $50,000, and sometimes $100,000 a mile to build their roads. If this country was not taken up with Government reserves, if this was not a national park, if it was cut up into farms and homes as it ought to be, and there were thousands of people in there creating commerce for those railroads to carry, does not the gentleman think they would get more out of it than they would out of the passenger traffic they are now taking in there? And are not the railroads justified in asking that the Government make this property available for tourists, inasmuch as the Government has set it aside for a national park? I think the people of the West are making a very reasonable request in asking the Government to construct roads through its reservations. I have sat here in this House and I have heard Members get up and say that the forests of the country that are left should be reserved for the use and benefit of the entire people. We have thousands of acres of forest reserves set aside, and people in the East to-day are hoping and thinking that some day those forest reserves will be converted into cash that will go into the National Treasury and reduce to some extent the taxes of all the people. They are trying to hold all the minerals that are in the mountains, in so far as they still belong to the Government. You all want to get the benefit from that.

Mr. SHERLEY. To whom does that land belong?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It belongs to the people. I am not questioning that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then why do you object to the people wanting to retain it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But it is within the confines of the States of Washington or Oregon or Idaho and other Western States, and those States do not get the benefit of one cent of taxes on such property. The people in the State of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] are getting taxes from every acre of that State to help pay the local and State expenses. You people in the East do not take into consideration the fact that an extraordinary burden is put upon the people who have Indian reservations, forest reserves, and national parks within their confines. All we want is to be treated with fairness.

Mr. SHERLEY. Virginia, of which my State was a part, gave to the Union a great deal of territory, so that the gentleman's story does not fit at all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. How many thousand acres of forest reserve have you in Kentucky?

Mr. SHERLEY. We have not any. I wish we had.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. How many Indian reservations and how many national parks that you do not get any taxes from?

Mr. SHERLEY. But listen. Where did you get your title?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. All titles come from the Government. The gentleman does not need to ask a question of that kind. There is no man here so obtuse as not to understand that all titles come from the Government. That is immaterial. It is not a question whether the Government has a right to set aside forest reserves, Indian reservations, and things of that kind, that the county and State can have no control over, but it is a question whether the Government should then compel the local community to build roads and keep them up in order to get to that property and get through it. I am talking not only of this national forest reserve, but of all kinds of Government reservations.

Mr. SHERLEY. In point of fact all titles do not come from the Government. The title of the Government came from the States in my part of the country, and in parts of the great Northwest that Virginia ceded to the United States. You would not have had the Northwest under the Stars and Stripes if it had not been for the Kentuckians who explored it and gave it to the Union.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That may be in part true.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman ought not to talk about getting title from the Government——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The gentleman invited it by his question. When was Kentucky made a State; when did you get your title to the land in Kentucky? Did you acquire it from the Crown; did the United States get it?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman had read the compact with Virginia, he would not ask the question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have read all of that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then the gentleman has forgotten it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I say Kentucky as a State never ceded anything to the National Government that she got from the Crown. All title has to come from the Government that was not acquired from the Crown.

If Kentucky received part of its territory from Virginia and through Virginia from the Crown, it was from Government just the same even though of Virginia and the Crown, and makes no difference in this controversy as to the right and expediency of the Government of the United States setting aside within the confines of any State of the Union national parks, forest reserves, and Indian reservations, and making inadequate or no provision at all for proper roads through these reservations. Granting that the Government has the power, is it just and right?

All we want is fair play. It is all any country in the West asks. When you set aside one-half or one-third or one-quarter of the territory in any State as reserves you should at least be willing to take care of the territory so set aside by constructing proper roads.

Mr. CANNON. There are a number of other gentlemen on this side who desire to be heard, but they are not present, and I take it they have abandoned their desire.

[Mr. FOSTER, Mr. MANN, Mr. PAYNE, Mr. HILL, Mr. HOWARD, Mr. CULLOP, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE were given leave to extend remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Appropriations Committee and of the subcommittee having in charge the preparation of this bill and reporting it to the House, I at the time it was reported had no purpose of submitting any remarks in the time allotted for general debate. I had hoped that the time might be limited to the least possible amount and that the bill might be brought to consideration under the five-minute rule and, as promptly as possible, passed through this House.

I have not been one of those who during the last few weeks have entertained even the hope that the Congress might complete its labors and adjourn by the middle of this month, and yet I had hoped that the necessary legislation of the session might be as speedily enacted as possible. I was somewhat disappointed on yesterday when it was demonstrated by a roll call that there were not as many gentlemen in the House anxious to finish the business and adjourn as I had hoped. Quite a number of them put themselves on record as opposed to the consideration of the appropriation bills and preferred rather to take the time in discussing and passing other matters.

I should not, as I said in the beginning, have spoken on the bill at all but for certain developments during the debate upon the bill. In the opening remarks the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], made a very full and, I think to the membership of the House, a satisfactory explanation of the items carried in the bill, of the amounts that it carried, and a complete justification of the reduction in the amount carried in this bill as compared with the current law.

I desire to say, as a member of that committee, that individually and for the majority of the committee reporting this bill we assume full responsibility for the appropriations, item by item, carried in the bill for the maintenance of the several branches of the Government during the coming fiscal year.

I go further than that, Mr. Chairman, and make the statement that I do not believe in the face of the great reductions that have been made in the volume of appropriations ordinarily carried in the bill that any single department in this Governmen will suffer one iota in its efficiency for the lack of a proper amount of money to carry on the bureau or the department for which it was appropriated.

On yesterday the distinguished leader of the minority, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], seemed impatient that the Appropriation Committee had delayed reporting this bill to the House for so long a time. I am sure that the gentleman forgot that the appropriations for the affairs of the National Government had been for 16 years in the hands of the Republican Party, and that the people having commissioned what had been the minority party during this period to legislate and appropriate for the maintenance of the Government, we felt it was incumbent upon us to go into and examine more fully than has ordinarily been necessary or has ordinarily been done, the various items that go to make up the appropriations carried in this great bill. The subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations charged with this responsibility has gone not only fully but extensively into the examination of Government officials and others who are responsible for the estimates submitted to the Congress in which they ask appropriations. I dare say, whether we have wisely investigated or otherwise, that so full an investigation of the estimates and of the necessities of the various departments that are appropriated for in the bill has not been undertaken by any committee in this House for 20 years, and I venture the assertion that so valuable information touching the administration of the various bureaus and departments for which we appropriate has not heretofore been placed in the records of this House.

The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], my colleague upon the committee and upon the subcommittee, the former Speaker of this House, a native of my own State, the most distinguished Member of this House, made a speech upon this bill a day or two ago, and in the course of his remarks assumed a position that is remarkable to some of us as coming from the gentleman from Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have had great admiration for the courage of the gentleman from Illinois. He has been a stalwart of the stalwarts. He has stood in this House as a stone wall for 30 years, yea, more than that, for nearly 40 years, and has contended that the legislative branch of this Government should not be encroached upon by the executive branch. I do not believe that in the history of the Congress of the United States this body has had a more insistent or abler defender than the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. [Applause.] Personally I have admired his persistence in this direction, and it is surprising, it is amazing, to some of us that after all these years he should at this late day in his long and illustrious career in this House surrender the position that he has occupied through all of these years and virtually say upon the floor of this House, in his criticism of items carried in the bill, that the majority is guilty, as he says, of sins of omission, in leaving out certain things which, in his judgment, should have gone in the bill. He cited item after item and made the statement that the estimate was so much, that the committee had allowed so much, and that he thought the estimates should have been allowed in full. Mr. Chairman, that is equivalent to saying that the gentleman from Illinois now believes the executive department of this Government should, in its estimates to this House, write into the law the amount of the appropriations for the various departments of the Government.

I can not believe that he really thinks this should be done, that the functions of the House of Representatives, the prerogatives that have been given it by the Constitution, which he has defended through all of these years, should be abrogated to the various departments of the executive branch of the Government. [Applause.] Yet this is the logical conclusion that one must reach from the argument that he made in general debate upon this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE. Cheerfully.

Mr. CANNON. By no manner of means do I claim that an estimate should be allowed in full as it is made. My only claim was and is that in instances where I criticized, the good of the public service and its efficiency was not benefited by withholding appropriations under the reduction of estimates as recommended by a majority of the committee. I did not discuss it at length and in detail, but I am prepared, under the five-minute rule, to justify at least myself to myself in the general statements that I made.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I shall be gratified if the gentleman, in discussion under the five-minute rule, shall change the impression that his speech made upon my mind. I was loath to believe that he had shifted the position which he had occupied for years as a Member of this House.

But, Mr. Chairman, coming now to a discussion of the items that are carried in this bill, I shall not occupy the attention of the committee for very long. I do not feel that it is necessary to enlarge upon the statement made by my colleague from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]; but there has been some criticism aimed at the action of the majority of the committee touching the bill as it is reported to the House for its failure to appropriate for the continuance of the so-called Tariff Board. My distinguished colleague on the committee [Mr. CANNON] entered into this criticism of the committee. In other words, he defended the so-called Tariff Board. I hope he did not do violence to his own conscience. He certainly did violence to his past record as touching this question. I am not going to discuss it, because others will, under the five-minute rule, discuss at length, I imagine, the wisdom of the majority of the committee in refusing to appropriate for the continuance of this board. I shall only say in passing that the Republican Party, in power in this country for 16 years, has been constantly during that time, until 1909, opposed to a Tariff Board or anything that was like a Tariff Board. They have opposed it whenever it was proposed upon the floor of this House to be written into legislation. They discovered, Mr. Chairman, only after the country had repudiated their position upon this question, that they needed advice upon this question. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It would have been vastly better for them, possibly, as a political party if they had had some board to advise them when they were enacting into law the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. It is our asset that they had no such advice, but because of their lack of information—not that they were not informed—but because of their lack of regard for the taxpayers of this country when they wrote this iniquity upon the statute books accounts to-day for the fact they are in the minority in this House and in November will be a minority in all branches of this Government. [Applause.]

After they had seen the handwriting upon the wall they pleaded for somebody to advise them how to write a tariff law. We are very much obliged to you, gentlemen, but we think we know what we want to write to relieve the taxpayers of this country from burdens which have been placed upon them by the tax laws that you have written upon the statute books.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to him the complaint of the country in the past has not been as to what came to the Ways and Means Committee but what came from it.

Mr. PAGE. Absolutely. Mr. Chairman, this great question of taxation through our tariff laws, whatever they may say and however they may try to shift the question that attracts the attention of the people at an approaching election, that is the question before the American people, and upon it will be decided the fate of parties and of men. Why, the Republican Party in the past 20 years has occupied varying and shifting positions upon this great question, except in one particular. They have continuously told the American public that they wanted protection. They started this great propaganda for infant industries. When those industries have grown into giants and monopolies, they have increased the amount of food that the infants required. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They have declared from time to time that it was for the protection not of manufacturers alone and for the infant industries of the country, but for the protection of the labor of the country. I can recall the day when men in the Republican Party who advocated the principle of protection boldly declared that the foreigner paid the tax. They were driven by public sentiment from that position and they have not made that statement for years. Then they have brought the claim that by this system they made it possible for the American manufacturer to maintain the wage of the American workman, and now one of their candidates for the nomination for the Presidency has enunciated for the Republican Party a new doctrine absolutely, and that is that it must be written into the law that the laborer must have his share. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I wonder what gentleman on that side is going to be commissioned to write this effectively into the law of the land.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion again, it is the first equitable proposition in connection with the protective tariff of which I have heard.

Mr. PAGE. But an absolutely impracticable proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true.

Mr. PAGE. To pass on to other matters, the Tariff Board, in the judgment of this side of the House, has not justified its existence, and for that reason the Committee on Appropriations has used the only means within its power, and that is the withholding of appropriations that made it possible. When this bill was first reported, as a member of the committee reporting it I was asked by a number of Members what the action of the committee had been touching the Economy Commission. Mr. Chairman, the fact that this bill carries in amount of appropriations $33,000,000 less than the current law is the most striking evidence that can be given to the House and to the country that at least the majority members of the Committee on Appropriations and this House are in favor of economy in the Government service. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I know that over on the other side of that aisle there have been coming a great many slurs and insinuations at this side of the House as to its professions of economy, and I think an answer to that will be made upon the last day of this session of Congress when the statement of cold facts is given to the people of the country, and for one I am ready to await that statement and the judgment of the people as touching it.

I know we have not economized to that degree that a great many of us would have liked. I am free to say that there are economies, in my judgment, that might have been effected that have not been effected, and some of these economies that might have been effected have not been effected on account of the solid vote against them on that side of the Chamber.

In speaking of the Economy Commission appointed by the President for the investigation of the executive departments of the Government and the methods of the administration of those departments looking to economies of expenditure, they have made partial reports to the President and to the Congress of the United States. The subcommittee had before it representatives of this commission and patiently for three days listened to their testimony touching not only what they had accomplished but the plans they had for the accomplishment of other things. We took into consideration the recommendations they had made both to the President and through him to the Congress. It is somewhat significant in this connection that this testimony taken before the subcommittee brought out the fact that the commission of the President, of his creation and reporting to him, made reports to the President of reforms that might be effected, saving thousands of dollars to the Government, as long ago as last December—reforms that required absolutely nothing except the Executive order of the President of the United States to put them into operation—and while six months have elapsed no order has been issued to put into effect these reforms that have been recommended by his own board. I recognize the fact that during this period of time the President has been very busy. Other things have occupied his mind and his time to the exclusion possibly of some of the things that would have saved the Government a mint of money. But, as a matter of fact, no Executive order has been issued based upon the recommendations of this board that would save the Government a dollar in its expenditure with perhaps one or two slight exceptions.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman were President, would he pursue the same course?

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman who is now addressing the committee has never for a moment contemplated what he would do if he were President, because he never had any aspirations or hopes of reaching that position.

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope he will pursue it with better success, anyway.

Mr. MANN. The Economy Commission reports, being called to the attention of the departments, and there being some question as to the applicability in each case to each department, do you not think it ought to be settled how these reforms can reach out in these departments rather than have the President issue half-baked resolutions applying these things to the various departments?

Mr. PAGE. I have no intention to be unfair to the President or to anybody else. I will admit that there is something in the suggestion, made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that it does take time to work out any great reforms. I only have this observation to make, and it is based upon my conclusion from the evidence that has come into the possession of the committee upon which I serve—not only the testimony of the gentlemen who are members of this Economy Commission, but statements made by various gentlemen connected with the several departments of the Government—that if the President waits until there is accord on the part of the bureaus and departments of the Government in the recommendations that have been made by the commission he will have to serve more than three terms before he gets one of these Executive orders into effect.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman agree with the President about that? Would the gentleman, if he had the power, issue an order directing that all these recommendations of the Economy Commission be in force?

Mr. PAGE. No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, of course, can not differentiate himself in the first instance.

Mr. PAGE. I want to say to the gentleman, in my judgment, as he has put the question to me, if I were President and there were recommendations made by this board to me that were so patent as to the feasibility of their operation and so clearly setting forth the saving of public money, I should put them into commission. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I have read the report of the Economy Commission. I have no doubt that the gentleman from North Carolina has done so. I have read all the reports carefully and annotated them. I would like to say to the gentleman if he has found very many recommendations on which he would issue a sweeping order and put in force in every department of the country I am very much surprised.

Mr. PAGE. That some reforms have been worked out by the Economy Commission that are valuable is undoubtedly true. I agree with the committee in retaining the commission. But I doubt whether any gentleman would have ordered them to be put in force in all of the departments, and necessarily it is impossible for the President carefully to examine all of the recommendations of the Economy Commission and himself to judge, in the first instance, without hearing from his department officers as to whether they should be adopted or not.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the gentleman——

Mr. SHERLEY. I would suggest that the President exercise enough discretion to send to Congress recommendations as to things concerning which he needed congressional action.

Mr. PAGE. Yes; I was going to mention that. He has sent in recommendations asking that they be enacted into law.

Mr. MANN. I would be very much surprised if the committee had acted upon them, and the committee, as a matter of fact, has not done it. The committee has not proposed to act upon them.

Mr. PAGE. Not all of them, but some of them. My only complaint is that the President has not put into effect any of them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman will admit that few people who are familiar with the Government service would propose to put some of them into execution.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is complaining because the recommendations have not been put into effect by a sweeping Executive order.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I mean to say again that I did not want to make any unfair criticism of the President. If I had any desire to enter into a criticism of the gentleman who occupies that high and exalted position, I should have attacked him through some other channel than the Economy Commission. I have no desire and I do not want to be unfair to him, but I want to say that this commission in its report has recommended certain matters in connection with the filing of papers and the handling of papers in the various departments of the Government that they say will save the Government a million dollars annually. Now, it does seem to me that that is a matter that could be determined inside of six months, as to whether or not that recommendation should be put into operation.

Further, they recommended that $50,000 could be saved by the use of the window envelope. This has been partially put into operation by the President. Then they have recommended various and sundry other things. In their recommendations they said that $50,000 could be saved by the discontinuance of affidavits appended to personal-expense vouchers. The committee has written into this bill a provision that will save that $50,000——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Without dispensing with the affidavits.

Mr. PAGE. Yes; without dispensing with the affidavits.

There was also a recommendation that concerned necessary legislation that could be put into operation touching the mailing of public documents. This committee has incorporated a provision carrying that into effect and carrying into effect the recommendation of the Economy Commission and the recommendation of the President as to another reform. They have recommended that a million dollars could be saved in the travel of officers and employees of the Government by the use of mileage books. That does not require legislative action. It seems to me that is a matter that could be worked out by the Executive in less time than six months. My only criticism is that those things which, in my judgment, might have been effected by an Executive order have not been put into operation.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman sure that that does not take any legislation?

Mr. PAGE. That is my opinion—that it does not take any legislation.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be correct, but I think he is wrong.

Mr. PAGE. Well, I may be wrong, and in the estimation of the gentleman from Illinois most of us are oftener wrong than right.

Mr. MANN. Well, as to the gentleman's side, that is absolutely true.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MALBY. I want to ask my colleague on the committee whether it does not appear from all our hearings of representatives of the various departments that they are now using mileage books wherever they can?

Mr. PAGE. Oh, no.

Mr. MALBY. I would be glad if the gentleman would state one department where they are not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman such additional time as he desires.

Mr. PAGE. I thank the gentleman. Now, I can not undertake to carry in my mind all the statements that were made in 3,000 pages of hearings——

Mr. MALBY. Of course not all of them——

Mr. PAGE. And this matter of mileage books came up in connection with almost every department, and my recollection is that almost every gentleman who appeared before the committee and to whom questions were propounded touching the propriety of using mileage books was ready to offer some reason why it could not be done. In other words, they were antagonistic to this recommendation of the Economy Commission.

Mr. MALBY. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MALBY. I acknowledge that the gentleman can not recall everything in 3,000 printed pages of hearings; but when he revises his remarks, as he probably will, if he can find a single official in any department of the Government who said that he would refuse to use mileage books on any such grounds, I hope he will put the statement in the RECORD.

Mr. PAGE. I have not found any department that refuses to use them, because there has been no order issued requiring them to be used.

Mr. MALBY. Or anybody who had neglected to use them.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that the Interstate Commerce Commission, that was supposed to know peculiarly about the subject of rates, was asked about the matter, and the suggestion was made by myself that they investigate the recommendation of the Economy Commission, and they promised to do so immediately.

Mr. PAGE. I recall very clearly that particular paragraph in the hearings.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAGE. With pleasure.

Mr. GILLETT. I should like to ask the gentleman whether it is not a fact that, although the President has not adopted all the recommendations of the Economy Board, yet this administration right here in Washington has introduced reforms in methods of administration which have saved hundreds of thousands of dollars a year.

Mr. PAGE. In the Treasury Department.

Mr. GILLETT. In the executive departments.

Mr. PAGE. In one department of the Government that is true, and the Treasury Department has instituted economies and reforms that are saving quite a sum of money in the administration of the department, and we have always given them credit for it, and did so in the report that was made to this House on the legislative bill.

Mr. HAY. Were these reforms in the Treasury Department the result of the recommendations of this Economy Commission?

Mr. PAGE. No; they were not. But I started out, not to criticize the President altogether, but to say that we believe that there are so many reforms that might be worked out to the advantage of the taxpayers of the country in the administration of the executive branch of this Government, and we have been so impressed with the fact that this commission would find some of these things, and that some of them, at any rate, would, on account of the work of this commission, be placed in effective operation, that we were not willing to assume the responsibility of discontinuing the existence of the commission. We did feel that we were justified in reducing the number of the chief officers of the commission.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. How many officers did they have?

Mr. PAGE. As now constituted, there are five members of the commission—a chairman and four other gentlemen—together with a secretary.

Mr. HAY. How much do those six men receive?

Mr. PAGE. The chairman of the commission receives a salary of $10,000 a year. Three of the commission receive salaries of $6,000 a year. The fourth member of the commission receives $40 a day for each day that he is engaged in this work, but his compensation must not exceed $6,000 in any one year.

Mr. HAY. Has he been drawing $6,000 a year under that arrangement?

Mr. PAGE. Yes; my information is that he has worked enough days to get the limit.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He has worked about half a year.

Mr. PAGE. About half a year.

Mr. HAY. How much is appropriated in all for this commission?

Mr. PAGE. They have had $175,000 in all. The estimate submitted to this Congress is $75,000.

Mr. HAY. Out of that they propose to pay $10,000 to one man and $6,000 to each of four men.

Mr. PAGE. Forty thousand dollars went for salaries, including the secretary.

Mr. HAY. To six men?

Mr. PAGE. Yes.

Mr. HAY. How many clerks have they?

Mr. PAGE. I have forgotten the number of men they have employed; but quite a number.

Mr. HAY. How many rooms have they at their disposal?

Mr. PAGE. I do not know that. I can not answer the gentleman in detail offhand. They are occupying considerable space.

Mr. HAY. About 14 rooms, have they not?

Mr. PAGE. I can not say as to the number of rooms.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I think it is only fair to the commission to say that they filed a detailed statement as to their rents and their expenses for furnishings and otherwise. That statement was quite satisfactory in every particular. I had the impression that they had been very extravagant because it had been commonly rumored that that was so, but these details which they have furnished are very full and complete.

Mr. PAGE. It is only fair to the commission to say that they have filed a detailed statement, showing not only the men that they have employed and the salaries they have received, but the rooms that they occupy and the rents they pay.

Mr. HAY. Who are these men who occupy these high-salaried places on the commission? Where do they come from?

Mr. PAGE. The chairman of the commission——

Mr. HAY. I understand about the chairman.

Mr. PAGE. I will read the biographies of this commission:

Frederick A. Cleveland, chairman: Age, 46. Salary as chairman of the President's Commission on Economy and Efficiency, $10,000 per annum; appointed March 8, 1911. Official positions previously held: Instructor of finance, University of Pennsylvania, 1900 to 1902; professor of finance, School of Commerce, Accounts, and Finance, New York University, 1903 to 1905; member of commission on finance and taxation appointed by Mayor McClellan, of the city of New York, 1905 to 1906; member of committee appointed by Comptroller Metz for the revision of accounts and administrative methods of New York, 1907 to 1908; member of committee on office methods and practices, appointed

(Did not enter on duties of office last named because of appointment as member of the commission.)

Frank J. Goodnow: Age, 53. Salary as member of the President's Commission on Economy and Efficiency, $6,000 per annum; appointed April 20, 1911. Official positions previously held: Professor of law, Columbia University, New York, since 1883; member of commission appointed by Gov. Roosevelt in 1900 to revise the charter of the city of New York; member of commission on finance and taxation appointed by Mayor McClellan, of the city of New York, 1905; member of commission appointed by Mayor Gaynor to inquire into the causes of congestion of population in New York, 1910; delegate of the United States Government to the first Congress of Administrative Science, at Brussels, 1910.

Harvey S. Chase: Age, 50. Salary as member of the President's Commission on Economy and Efficiency, $40 per day while on duty at Washington, without cost to the Government for traveling and personal expenses, the total cost per annum not to exceed $6,000; appointed June 30, 1911. Official positions previously held: Consulting expert in the installation of uniform systems of accounting for the State of Ohio, 1902; expert for finance commission of the city of Boston, 1908 to 1910; expert for governor of State of Massachusetts, 1910 to 1911; president of Massachusetts Society of Public Accountants; trustee and member of executive committee of American Association of Public Accountants.

Merritt O. Chance, secretary: Age, 42. Salary as secretary of the President's Commission on Economy and Efficiency, $6,000 per annum; appointed March 8, 1911. Official positions previously held: Assistant messenger, Post Office Department, 1888; clerk, War Department, 1890; clerk, Post Office Department, 1891 to 1894; clerk and private secretary to Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, 1895 to 1899; chief clerk, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, 1899 to 1901; private secretary to the Secretary of War, 1901 to 1904; superintendent of post-office supplies, Post Office Department, 1904; chief clerk, Post Office Department, 1905 to 1908; Auditor for the Post Office Department, 1908 to 1911.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I want to observe that in view of the interesting biographies of these gentlemen, and from the comfortable salaries they now enjoy, it strikes me as a standing refutation of the old proverb that "a rolling stone gathers no moss." [Laughter.]

Mr. PAGE. I think that is a very apt observation.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE. I will.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it not a fact that the secretary of this commission, who was formerly an auditor of the Post Office Department, is the one that largely helped to put into operation the reforms in the Treasury Department?

Mr. PAGE. I can not answer the gentleman, because I do not know of my own knowledge.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. PAGE. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say that the amount of money expended for the services of this commission up to now is $175,000.

Mr. PAGE. That amount has been appropriated up to the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. But not expended. The commission has been in office about a year?

Mr. PAGE. More than a year. They went into office, the most of them, on the 8th of April, 1911.

Mr. MADDEN. Can the gentleman state what the amount saved thus far has been as the result of the recommendations made by the commission?

Mr. PAGE. I can not; and neither can anybody else. To be entirely frank, I do not think it fair to test the value of this commission by the results to this date, because it necessarily takes time to work out and carry into effect reforms as far-reaching as are needed in the various departments of the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. That is exactly what I wanted the gentleman to state.

Mr. PAGE. For that reason the Appropriations Committee did not feel warranted in discontinuing the appropriation and the commission, because it did not feel that there had been sufficient time for them to demonstrate whether or not their work was of real value.

Mr. MADDEN. What I was fearful of was that the gentleman would leave the impression on the minds of Members of the House that the commission had rendered no service of any value.

Mr. PAGE. If the gentleman thought that, he should not have voted to continue the commission.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I do not believe that; I believe that they are of value.

Mr. PAGE. I think they may be of value, and we were willing to give them a chance. Personally I had this sort of mental reservation—that if they did not make good, after the 4th of next March a Democratic President could discontinue them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. But the gentlemen may not have the pleasure of recognizing that right under a Democratic President.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman said either that he had reduced the number or the pay of the commission, as I understood him.

Mr. PAGE. We have a provision which provides that not more than three persons shall receive from this appropriation a salary in excess of $4,000 per annum. The committee did that because, recognizing that there was a possibility of accomplishing a real economy through the activities of these gentlemen, we thought it was a little bit overorganized or top-heavy, and I think the House will agree with us.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have occupied vastly more time, not only on the Economy Commission but upon other things, than I started out to.

Before taking my seat there are one or two other matters that I desire to advert to. The other day, when the chairman of the committee was making his statement to the House, there was a great deal of interest elicited, not only on that side of the Chamber—for while most of the questions came from that side they were of as acute interest on this side—touching the appropriations carried in this bill for the Isthmian Canal.

Upon the face of it, as explained by the chairman, a reduction of $13,000,000 in the appropriation for the Isthmian Canal might make an impression on the minds of some gentleman who has not had an opportunity to inform himself as being calculated to retard or hinder the execution and completion of this great project. I want to assure the membership of the House that not only have we not been guilty of cutting the appropriation for that great work, but I want to assure gentlemen on that side of the House—and the record in the past will bear me out—that this side of the House has never done anything to hinder the construction of the Panama Canal, and it has been one of the great enterprises of this Government upon which there has been no party division.

We are as much in earnest and are as much concerned about the continuance and completion of the work as gentlemen on that side of the Chamber can be. If I believed that there was a single item in this bill that did not carry a sufficient amount of money to carry on this work with all the speed that the great organizer who is the head of the Isthmian Canal Commission had planned, I should not support it, but would gladly increase the amount.

I want to say upon my personal responsibility that aside from the hearings to guide the committee and that are within the reach of every Member of the House, the chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission, when last in Washington—I believe in April—appeared before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations making up this bill, and we then went over item by item the estimates that had been submitted and the amounts that in his judgment would be necessary for the coming fiscal year.

Unfortunately, I think now we did not have present at that hearing a reporter to take down what was said, but I took the precaution while Col. Goethals was making this statement to take my committee copy of the bill appropriating for the Isthmian Canal, and item by item I wrote in the margin of that bill the exact amount that Col. Goethals said was necessary to continue the work during the next 12 months. When we came to write the appropriations in the bill, I insisted—no, it took no insistence, because we agreed that every dollar that he had indicated he needed should be written in the bill, and it is written in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know what the record does not show which came to the gentleman's knowledge, but under the five-minute rule I will read from the record as it is what Col. Goethals and the Chief of Staff said touching the appropriations for the Panama Canal.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I prefaced my remarks by the statement that the committee was in possession of information that did not appear in the public hearings, and I said I thought it was unfortunate that it did not appear in the public hearings. My memory is not exactly clear, but I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], a member of that subcommittee, while possibly not present during the entire time that Col. Goethals was making his statement, did come into the room and heard at least a part of the statements that Col. Goethals made.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not recollect in 3,000 pages of evidence, and could not say whether I was present at the time the gentleman refers to or not. I get my information from the record of the two officers, who were chiefly responsible, as well as from an estimate sent by the Secretary of War in April, and I stated the matter in perfect good faith. The whole matter can be threshed out later under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PAGE. O Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my friend that in anything I have said I did not have in mind any statement he made the other day, nor did I intend to reflect upon anything he said.

Mr. CANNON. The whole matter can be threshed out under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I want to ask the gentleman a question, and I hope he will not consider it a reflection upon the committee.

Mr. PAGE. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. But does the gentleman think it quite fair to the House for the Committee on Appropriations to take testimony to the extent of 3,000 printed pages upon the sundry civil appropriation bill and then on as important an item as the Panama Canal to base its figures for appropriation upon secret testimony not taken down and furnished to the House, but which the gentleman himself undertakes to furnish orally to the House?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman constantly appeals to me and to other gentlemen on this side of the Chamber in the interest of fairness. It might come from other gentlemen with better grace. He is not himself always fair. I want to say that this is not the first time that the appropriations for the Isthmian Canal have been made upon testimony that did not appear in the record, but I prefaced my statement by saying that I personally thought it was unfortunate that it did not appear in the record, but I was stating merely the facts as they existed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, he replied to my question with an epithet, but that is all.

Mr. PAGE. That is the usual brand of fairness that the gentleman from Illinois deals in in this House.

Mr. MANN. That is the usual brand of fairness the gentleman exhibits.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, speaking for myself, I think a proper consideration and weighing of the testimony which is printed, plus that knowledge that comes to men who have visited the canal and who are familiar with conditions, warrants, without reference to anything else, every recommendation that we have made in the bill.

I am willing to meet the case on the record as printed, although it is true, as stated by the gentleman, in order that we might be sure that we make no mistake we had this informal conference with the chief engineer, Col. Goethals, and it is also true that during that conference the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] came in and attended part of it.

Mr. PAGE. I agree entirely with my colleague from Kentucky that we can justify the items carried in this bill from the printed testimony.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow.

Mr. PAGE. With pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. I get my only knowledge touching the matter in controversy from the evidence as printed. I was not constant in attendance, owing to my duty as a Member and otherwise, upon the hearings of this committee, and I can not say that what the gentleman states as to Col. Goethals's statement that does not appear in the record is not correct, because I regard the gentleman—have always and do now, both gentlemen—as being truthful men, but I want to say that I have no recollection of any statement that Col. Goethals made in the premises that does not appear in the record.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me make this statement: There should be no misunderstanding about what happened. Before Col. Goethals was ready to leave the city and return to the Isthmus, at my request, he reexamined the estimates submitted and agreed to do what had been the practice in other years—to indicate to the committee what sums could be eliminated, because of the later information he had that they would not be required. He came to the committee room one morning and I invited him into my office. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] came to the committee room and he came in. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] came to the committee room and he came in. It was not a prearranged meeting. We asked Mr. Courts, clerk to the committee, to come in, and the matter was being discussed when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] came in and inquired what was being done.

Within a short time the gentleman from Illinois stated that he had to attend to some other matter that had previously been arranged to occupy his attention and was compelled to leave. During this informal conference these figures were taken from Col. Goethals and noted by those present on their books. In some respects the sums recommended are somewhat different from the sums stated by Col. Goethals, but the differences are not very great, and no different in such respect than the changes made on other occasions. There was no intention nor attempt either to withhold information or to misrepresent. My only purpose now is to prevent any misunderstanding because I believe and I am aware that everybody desires to make such recommendations for the canal as may be necessary.

Mr. CANNON. Just let me state in justice to myself it might be inferred from the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky and the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina that I was present when something was said that does not appear in the record. I do not recollect that it presented itself as the gentleman from New York states, but I rely upon the printed record where there is a record. I do not dispute what the gentleman states.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that. I simply wished to make that statement so there will be no misunderstanding that there was any attempt to obtain information that would not be accessible to everybody.

Mr. CANNON. I do not so intimate.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit. There was nothing in my statement that should ruffle the most sensitive nerve of the gentleman from Illinois. I am not reflecting upon him at all. He has made such criticisms of the bill as he saw proper. That is all right. I know I have been on the Committee on Appropriations for five years or more and we have dealt with the Panama Canal in this instance in no different way than we dealt with it in years gone by while Republicans were in control, and there was not the slightest intention on my part, and I am sure there was not on the part of any Democratic member on the committee, to in any way impede the work. I say this not because of what the gentleman from Illinois has said, but more particularly because of the statement that has gone out in the press.

There was in a morning paper in Washington to-day a statement to the effect that we had made a cut that was not only incomprehensible but the inference was that is was absolutely indefensible. Now, if the man who wrote that editorial had taken the trouble to read the hearings and obtained the information therein contained he would never have written it, but it is in keeping with much that has gone out to the public touching the recommendations for appropriations that happen to be below the estimates. The only way we can please some gentlemen in and out of the House is by giving exactly what any department asks, whether they need the money or not.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me just there?

Mr. PAGE. I will yield to the gentleman, but I will say there is some pressure being brought to bear upon me to close, and I desire to close my remarks in a few minutes.

Mr. CANNON. All I wanted to say was this. I do not know the gentlemen to whom the gentleman from Kentucky refers as being in the House who are not pleased unless full estimates are given. Those out of the House I do not know nor care.

I want to say to the gentleman that I am one of the Members of the House that never rush to the newspapers to give real information or misinformation.

Mr. SHERLEY. I take the gentleman's disclaimer. It was not necessary, because I did not suppose he had gone to the newspaper.

Mr. CANNON. After all, I am a Member of the House, and there is this omission in the appropriation, and I am willing to wait for the consideration of it.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I am sure when we come to the consideration of the items appropriating for the Panama Canal, under the five-minute rule, that those of us who are responsible for the amounts in this bill can justify to the House and to the country that the appropriations we have made are not only ample for the continuation of that great work, but that they meet the approval of the chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Now, Mr. Chairman, reverting to one other matter, and in conclusion—because while other gentlemen have occupied a great deal of time that has been charged up to me, I have occupied a great deal more than was anticipated—I want before I close to revert to one other question.

Mr. MADDEN. May I interrupt the gentleman from North Carolina with relation to the canal?

Mr. PAGE. If you will be brief.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know whether the force on the canal has been reduced? If so, how much?

Mr. PAGE. I think the information before the committee is that it has been materially reduced within the last six months.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the committee any information as to the number of men employed on the canal now?

Mr. PAGE. I think the latest testimony before the committee as to the number of men employed was at the time of the taking of the testimony on the Isthmus, in November, when the committee was there.

Mr. MADDEN. How does that compare with the previous years?

Mr. PAGE. I can not tell the gentleman, except that there was a reduction.

Mr. MADDEN. The reason I am asking these questions is this: It was with the idea, in fact, of ascertaining whether or not the force had been reduced sufficiently to justify a proportionate reduction.

Mr. PAGE. I think that is not only true, but the gentleman also knows that in the progress of the construction of the canal the efficiency of those employed has been vastly increased, much beyond the expectation of even the men who had the work in charge. In addition to the money appropriated in this bill, and I feel it is only fair to say that, they will have at least $5,000,000 of a surplus from the appropriations of last year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there has been some evidence that there will be controversy upon the floor of the House relating to one other item when it is reached in the bill. I want at this stage of the discussion to submit just a few remarks concerning a belated estimate, although a great many belated estimates come before this committee, coming in even after the bill was ready to report to the House. There was one sent in by the Treasury Department recommending the appropriation of $500,000 for what is known as the epidemic fund—a fund that has existed since the nineties—to enable the President to suppress outbreaks of epidemics of contagious diseases specified in the original enactment, and quite a sum of money has been expended through the Marine-Hospital Service in the suppression of outbreaks of yellow fever, cholera, and the bubonic plague. The last appropriation made for this fund was carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill of 1909, and was in amount $750,000. In the years 1907 and 1908 there was an outbreak in the cities on the Pacific coast of bubonic plague, and a considerable amount of this money was expended under the authority of law and under the direction of the President for the stamping out of this oriental disease that has made its way to our shores. First and last, there has been expended from this fund in California a sum exceeding a million dollars. While there has not been a case of bubonic plague in a human being on the Pacific coast, I believe, since 1909, there is still being expended under this service about $14,000 a month in the eradication of rats and ground squirrels that are the conveyors of this disease to human beings.

I have no criticism to make of the expenditures that have been made from this fund by direction of the President and through this organization upon the Pacific coast and elsewhere. But it appeared to the committee that there was approximately $100,000 of this fund yet unexpended, and that the expenditures were almost entirely confined to the State of California for the exterminating of ground squirrels, at the rate of about $14,000 a month, and a simple calculation in arithmetic will demonstrate that it will not take the $100,000 carried in this appropriation to continue this work during the next year.

But, Mr. Chairman, in this connection I want to say that in the judgment of some people very much nearer to the existence of this supposed plague than those of us who are legislating here in Washington, the danger of the spread of the bubonic plague is a thing of the past in California, and it is due largely to the vigilance and the active work of the officials of the Marine-Hospital Service. It has cost, under the testimony submitted to the committee, something like $1,500 for every infected ground squirrel that has been killed in California. It is a pretty expensive hunting expedition. But it appeared to the committee—and it had some weight as to the amount of money that we appropriated for the continuance of this work upon the Pacific coast—that the State of California itself failed to make any appropriation for the continuance of this work during the last session of its legislature, or if there was legislation enacted it was vetoed by the governor.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that there is a general law in the State of California which makes the charge a lien upon the property whenever the owner refuses to do his share of the work of killing the rodents upon his property and the local government performs that work? The cost of the extermination is a lien upon the property. Is the gentleman also aware of the fact that there is scarcely a county in the State of California having infected ground squirrels and rats where the owners of property and the counties themselves have refused to make appropriation for this work?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, the fact that the gentleman states may be true. I do not care to controvert and can not controvert it, but the fact remains that the lien that the gentleman speaks of is absolutely ineffective because of the lack of legislative action on the part of the State of California to make it effective.

Mr. KAHN. I know the gentleman does not want to misstate the facts.

Mr. PAGE. Well, then, will the gentleman state the situation briefly?

Mr. KAHN. The policy of the Government is to go into those counties where there are large Government reserves. At present the counties are doing their work against the squirrels on land within their boundaries, but on the Government reserves the Government ought to do the work.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, the testimony had before the committee does not correspond with the statement made by the gentleman from California—that Government money is to be expended only on Government land. On the contrary, the statement is in the record, made by the head of the Marine-Hospital Service, that this money has been expended in the various counties of California and in the cities outside, largely, of the Government reserves.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman will excuse me. I am not going to make any further statement that he will controvert.

Mr. KAHN. I only want the gentleman to be fair toward the taxpayers of California.

Mr. PAGE. Oh, the gentleman will have ample time in which to discuss this subject under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KAHN. I am quite sure that the gentleman in his speech does not intend to make any unfair statement.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I will say in conclusion that while the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] expressed his willingness to appropriate any amount of money that might be required for this fund, the committee felt absolutely justified in appropriating only the amount carried in this bill, on the ground that it was ample to meet any emergency that might arise, and has felt sure that the efficiency of the Marine-Hospital Service and our quarantine service, and its increased efficiency, if you please, has made it and will make it less necessary from year to year to expend large sums of money to keep out epidemics and plagues.

And now, Mr. Chairman, one word more and I shall close. I have been led far astray from the remarks that I intended to submit. I wanted only to point out in the bill, or in connection with the bill, some things that, in my judgment, confirmed by the testimony taken, would justify the committee in reductions that have been made in the appropriations carried by this appropriation bill.

We are willing as a committee to say to our colleagues on this side of the House and to our colleagues on that side of the House that we believe every single item carried by an appropriation in this bill is ample for the service for which it is appropriated; and in spite of the fact that the statement has repeatedly been made that we will be faced by deficits and deficiency appropriations I do not believe that even if the country is inflicted with a Republican administration for another four years, and God forbid, we will have deficiencies under these appropriations; and I know that if the future brings what we are expecting and what our friends on the other side of the Chamber are about ready to concede, a Democratic administration, we shall have, under this Democratic administration, not a deficit, but an economical administration of the executive departments of this Government that will bring surpluses and not deficiencies in the appropriations under this bill a year from now. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, for the objects hereinafter expressed, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, namely:

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

GETTYSBURG ANNIVERSARY—CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request for a change of reference.

The Clerk read as follows:

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs is discharged from further consideration of S. 6964, an act authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to make certain provisions for the care of the participants in the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Battle of Gettysburg, at Gettysburg, Pa., on the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th days of July, 1913, and making appropriation of a sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of this bill and the same is referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANN. What is that request?

The SPEAKER. To change the reference of the bill to make arrangements to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the Battle of Gettysburg. The change of reference is requested at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MANN. I will not object; but I do not see what jurisdiction the Committee on Appropriations has.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A bill was introduced in the House and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The Senate passed a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I called the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to the fact that the two bills ought to be in the hands of one committee. I have no particular desire to control the matter.

Mr. MANN. This is a Senate bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the Committee on Appropriations would have jurisdiction to report it if it is a Senate bill referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

VIEWS OF MINORITY ON COTTON BILL (H. REPT. NO. 829, PT. 2).

Mr. PAYNE. The views of the minority were to be filed today on the cotton bill, H. R. 25034. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] who has them is not here just now. I ask that the time be extended for one day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend the time for one day in which to file the views of the minority on the cotton bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9061. An act limiting hours of daily services of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States, or for any Territory, or for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 5910. An act granting to the city of Portland, Oreg., certain strips of land from the post-office and customhouse sites in said city for street purposes; and

S. 6848. An act authorizing the Cooper River Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of South Carolina, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Goose Creek, in Berkeley County, S. C.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 7002. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant to Salt Lake City, Utah, a right of way over certain public land for reservoir purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

DUPLICATE ENGROSSED COPY OF IMMIGRATION BILL.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution (H. Res. 574) was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to request the Senate to furnish the House of Representatives with a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 3175) entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I will ask who makes this request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT]. The engrossed bill has been lost or mislaid, and we are merely asking for a copy of it.

Mr. MANN. Where was it lost?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. We have had so many of these losses, I should like to have some explanation.

Mr. BURNETT. The Clerk's books show that the bill was signed for by the messenger of our committee, and the clerk of our committee says he has not seen the bill; that it has not reached him.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if the enrolling clerk holds the receipt of the Committee on Immigration?

Mr. BURNETT. The messenger does.

Mr. MANN. What was the bill?

Mr. BURNETT. The bill known as the Dillingham immigration bill, a Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman's resolution is asking for a copy.

Mr. MANN. I have a curiosity to know, Mr. Speaker, how so many engrossed bills get lost—whether it is because we dispensed with the messenger whose business it was to deliver bills to the committees. I suspect that is the reason.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama states that the clerk of the enrolling committee has the receipt of his messenger. That is as far as the Chair has obtained any information.

Mr. MANN. The old practice was for the messenger to take the bills to the committees and take receipts from the clerk of the committee, and very seldom was a bill lost. Now they drop them on the sidewalk between here and the Office Building. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if any committee of the House of Representatives has a messenger who is incapable of carrying a bill from the desk to the office to which it belongs he ought to be fired.

Mr. MANN. There are many messengers around here that I would not intrust with an engrossed or an enrolled bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

DEATH OF SENATOR NIXON, OF NEVADA.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, it is my solemn and painful duty to announce to the House the death of the Hon. GEORGE S. NIXON, a United States Senator from the State of Nevada. Thus has ended the life of an honored and useful servant and one who was universally respected. At some future time I shall ask that a date be set apart to pay proper tribute to his memory. I now offer the following resolutions, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 575.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. GEORGE S. NIXON, a Senator of the United States from the State of Nevada.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That a committee of 12 Members be appointed on the part of the House to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate to attend the funeral.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the committee of Members to attend the funeral as follows: Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada, Mr. LANGHAM of Pennsylvania, Mr. BOWMAN of Pennsylvania, Mr. RAKER of California, Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia, Mr. DYER of Missouri, Mr. GOULD of Maine, Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts, Mr. RUBEY of Missouri, Mr. LANGLEY of Kentucky, Mr. YOUNG of Kansas, and Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 7, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting estimate of deficiencies in appropriations for the Marine Corps (H. Doc. No. 820) was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 6918) increasing the cost of erection of a United States post-office building at Hillsboro, Tex., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 862) thereon.

LIFEBOATS ON ARMY TRANSPORTS.

Mr. DU PONT. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 23626) to appropriate $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to equip all Army transports with all lifeboats and rafts necessary to accommodate every person for which transportation facilities are now provided on said transports, and the crew of said transports. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is that an emergency appropriation, I should like to inquire?

Mr. DU PONT. It is an appropriation placed in the bill and passed by the House. It is designed to protect the lives of officers and soldiers and crew who are on Government transports by properly equipping the transports with lifeboats and other life-saving apparatus.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has it been estimated for?

Mr. DU PONT. The bill came from the House, and estimates are always considered there. I presume it was estimated for. I am not able to answer the question.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has it been considered in a Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. DU PONT. It undoubtedly has been in the House. It has passed the House and was considered here by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to know why we are called on to appropriate $300,000 in this way, and why it is not included in the regular appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask to have the bill read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will again read the bill.

The Secretary again read the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LODGE. It is reported from the Committee on Military Affairs?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill, and the Senator from Delaware has asked for its present consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not understand why it has not been before some Appropriation Committee that handles these bills.

Mr. LODGE. The Committee on Military Affairs has charge of the Army appropriation bill. That is an appropriation committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why was it not included in the Army appropriation bill if it is not an emergency appropriation?

Mr. LODGE. I suppose it came in too late.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to know something more about it.

Mr. LODGE. The object is to protect Government transports with lifeboats. We have just had a pretty serious example of the absence of lifeboats, and it seems to me it is a wise thing to do.

Mr. DU PONT. I will state that it is designed to meet a special emergency in view of the lesson the country and the world has received as to the result of inadequate life-saving appliances.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to know something about the merits of the measure and why such a large amount of money should be appropriated by a simple bill for the purpose.

Mr. DU PONT. It is a House bill. It has passed the House.

Mr. OVERMAN. The House may do things that are right and they may do things that are not right. I am not making any objection, however, to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 7, after the word "rafts," to insert: "including such number of steel self-righting, self-bailing motor lifeboats for each vessel as the Secretary of War may deem advisable."

So as to make the bill read:

That the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of equipping all Army transports with all lifeboats and rafts, including such number of steel self-righting, self-bailing, motor lifeboats for each vessel as the Secretary of War may deem advisable, necessary to accommodate every person for whom transportation facilities are now provided on said transports, and the crew of said transports; said sum to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, who is hereby directed to make to Congress an itemized statement showing how the sum aforesaid has been expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. WORKS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 as an additional amount toward the erection of a public building in Santa Barbara, Cal., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 25069), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $200,000 for the construction of a general administration building at the new Army supply depot, Fort Mason, Cal., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 25069), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment authorizing the President to appoint William E. Farrell, late midshipman, an ensign in the United States Navy, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 24565), which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing that the salary of one of the clerks for assistant paymasters in the Marine Corps be $1,500 per annum, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 24565), which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROOT submitted an amendment relative to contract or contracts entered into in connection with the construction of the Isthmian Canal, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 24565), which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment authorizing Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress to send by registered mail, free of charge, United States maps, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 21279), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $74,000 for additional books authorized to be furnished under section 229 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 25069), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $30,000 to pay to the National Irrigation Congress to assist in defraying the expenses of the twentieth annual meeting of the Congress to be held at Salt Lake City, Utah, commencing September 30, 1912, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 25069), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

DONATION OF CANNON.

Mr. STONE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 24458) authorizing the Secretary of War in his discretion to deliver to certain cities and towns condemned bronze or brass cannon with carriages and outfit of cannon balls, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 24458) authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to deliver to certain cities condemned bronze and brass cannon with their carriages and outfit of cannon balls, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con Res. 23), which was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Mississippi River Commission be instructed to report to Congress a plan for the complete control of the Mississippi River for the purpose of preventing floods and in the interest of navigation, and an estimate of the cost thereof, including such dredging, canalizing at sharp bends, revetting, continuous leveeing on both banks thereof, flood gates, and any and all other work as may seem to them to be a part of a complete plan, and that the necessary steps to make the report be taken at once, so that the report may be in the hands of Congress at the earliest possible opportunity.

RENTALS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to offer a concurrent resolution, and before the resolution is read I wish to say that in view of the discussion a few days ago concerning the rental of buildings in the District of Columbia, I have received several letters, two from the owners of property, saying that the matter was not fairly presented, and one from a private citizen who says that the Government is renting more or less space in a building or buildings owned by the Government at a price far below what the Government ought to receive, this party saying that he is prepared to pay twice the amount the Government is receiving. He insists that this matter ought also to be looked into.

I offer this concurrent resolution for the creation of a joint committee to look into the matter, which I think is desirable. There is no purpose on my part to do the owners of property which is rented to the Government an injustice. The proposed inquiry will clear the matter up. The resolution should be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 22) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint special committee of the two Houses of Congress is hereby created, to be composed of three Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the Presiding Officer thereof, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker thereof; and any vacancy on the committee shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. The said committee is hereby empowered and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to sit during the sessions or recess of Congress, to carefully inquire into the possibility of better utilizing space in the several departments of the General Government and the District of Columbia, and also to make a thorough investigation of the rentals paid by the Government and the District of Columbia. Said committee is authorized to employ a stenographer and such other assistants as may be necessary, and shall conclude its investigation and report to the Sixty-third Congress the result thereof, together with its recommendations concerning such legislation, if any, as may be advisable. The expenses incurred by said committee shall be paid equally out of the contingent funds of the Senate and the House of Representatives, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and of the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives, respectively.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On June 6, 1912:

S. 3367. An act to amend section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to homesteads;

S. 125. An act to permit the American Academy in Rome to enlarge its purposes, and for other purposes;

On June 7, 1912:

S. 4572. An act to designate Walhalla, Neche, and St. John, in the State of North Dakota, subports of entry, and to extend the privileges of the first section of the act of Congress approved June 10, 1880, to said subports.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives to be furnished with a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 3175) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States, and there being no objection the request was ordered to be complied with.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18712) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. GORE managers at the conference on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. GORE managers at the conference on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 23765) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. GORE managers at the conference on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 17260. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish in the Department of the Interior a Bureau of Mines," approved May 16, 1910, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the want of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cummins	Lodge	Smith, Md.
Bacon	Curtis	Lorimer	Smith, S. C.
Bourne	Dillingham	McCumber	Smoot
Bradley	du Pont	McLean	Stephenson
Brandegee	Foster	Martin, Va.	Stone
Briggs	Gallinger	Myers	Sutherland
Bristow	Gardner	Nelson	Thornton
Brown	Gronna	Overman	Tillman
Bryan	Guggenheim	Page	Townsend
Burnham	Heyburn	Perkins	Wetmore
Burton	Hitchcock	Pomerene	Works
Catron	Johnston, Ala.	Root
Clapp	Jones	Shively
Cullom	Kern	Simmons

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is detained from the Chamber by important business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 315, submitted by Mr. LEA May 20, 1912, as follows:

Resolved, That corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States from the State of Illinois, and that his election was therefore invalid.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, before proceeding with a discussion of the evidence to-day, I desire to refer briefly to a colloquy between the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] and myself on Tuesday last, which evidently grew out of a misunderstanding as to what I said, or what I intended to say, concerning the motives which probably prompted his proffered support of Gov. Deneen for the Senatorship prior to his own avowed candidacy. I intended to say, and thought I did say, that this support was offered not because the Senator from Illinois loved Gov. Deneen but because he wanted him out of the governor's office, that his friend, the lieutenant governor, might have that position, thereby giving to the Senator and his friends full control of the political situation in Illinois. The Senator from Illinois understood me to say that the offered support was because he loved Gov. Deneen. It may be that by a slip of the tongue I used that language, but it will be quite apparent to anyone who heard the evidence that a statement that the Senator was offering to support Gov. Deneen because of personal affection would have been utterly ridiculous. I certainly had no such thought in my mind.

I was proceeding, at the conclusion of my remarks on Tuesday, to show the absurdity and the utter unreliability of the testimony of Paul McCann, the page who was produced to overthrow the very damaging testimony of Representative George W. Meyers, who, with great positiveness, had testified that before the roll call on the senatorial vote he, fixing the time at about 20 minutes before the commencement of the roll call, had gone to Lee O'Neil Browne's desk in response to the latter's request, and was then and there urged by the latter to support Senator LORIMER, Browne tempting him with the statement as to the State jobs yet remaining for distribution, and also, to use his own language, "plenty of the necessary." Paul McCann testified positively that on that day he stood by Lee O'Neil Browne's desk from 10 o'clock in the morning until 5 minutes before 12, when, at Browne's request, he went to the clerk's desk to procure some blank roll calls, which did not occupy more than 5 minutes; that he then resumed his position at Browne's desk, and remained there throughout the proceedings attending the senatorial election; that at no time during that period, which would be from 10 o'clock in the morning to 2 or 3 o'clock in the afternoon, did Mr. Meyers or anybody else approach the desk of Mr. Browne, and that Mr. Meyers could not have gone to Browne's desk during the five-minute period that he was getting the roll calls without his seeing him. I now read from page 6960 of the testimony. After testifying that between 10 and 12 o'clock the legislature was at work reading bills most of the time, his examination proceeded as follows:

Senator JONES. Were not the members sending the pages for anything during that time?
Mr. McCANN. No, sir.
Senator JONES. So that you say now, positively, that you never left Browne's desk from 10 o'clock until about 5 minutes before 12 that morning?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir.
Senator JONES. You stood right there by him all the time?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir.
Senator JONES. Did he sit there in his desk all the time?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir.
Senator JONES. He never got up?
Mr. McCANN. No, sir.

Reading again from page 6963:

Senator JONES. Were all the members in their seats that day between 10 o'clock and 12?
Mr. McCANN. No, sir.
Senator JONES. How many were not in their seats?
Mr. McCANN. Oh, I could not tell you that.
Senator JONES. A great many?
Mr. McCANN. Yes; about half of them.
Senator JONES. About half of them?
Mr. McCANN. Yes.
Senator JONES. Were the others on the floor, or were they outside of the chamber?
Mr. McCANN. On the floor.
Senator JONES. What were they doing?
Mr. McCANN. Conferring.
Senator JONES. Walking around here, there, and yonder?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir; buying newspapers.
Senator JONES. And yet you say none of them came to Browne's desk that morning?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir.
Senator JONES. Between 10 and 12?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir.
Senator JONES. Did anybody come to his desk between 10 and 12 on the 25th?—

That being the day before—

Mr. McCANN. I do not remember that.
Senator JONES. You do not remember whether they did or not?
Mr. McCANN. No, sir.
Senator JONES. Why do you not remember that?
Mr. McCANN. Because I do not remember it.
Senator JONES. Was there any reason why you should remember the 26th rather than the 25th?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir.
Senator JONES. Why?
Mr. McCANN. Because it was more excitable that day than usual.
Senator JONES. Were they all excited at 10 o'clock?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir.
Senator JONES. How did they manifest their excitement?
Mr. McCANN. By going to each other, laughing, and making more noise; more excitement all around.
Senator JONES. They were going around generally, talking to each other and laughing?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir.
Senator JONES. And yet you mean to say that nobody came to Browne and talked to him?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir.

Reading, again, from page 6969:

Senator LEA. And during that whole period of time not a single other member of the legislature came to his desk?
Mr. McCANN. No, sir.
Senator LEA. You are positive of that?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir.
Senator LEA. You would remember if they had done so?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir.
Senator LEA. The other members, as I understand it, were visiting each other?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir.
Senator LEA. But no one visited Mr. Browne and he visited no one?
Mr. McCANN. No, sir.
Senator LEA. You are absolutely positive of that?
Mr. McCANN. Yes.
Senator LEA. Your recollection is clear?
Mr. McCANN. Yes, sir.

Again, on page 6971, referring to Browne:

Senator JONES. On the 26th, from the time he came in there at 10.30, what did he do until noon?
Mr. McCANN. He read the morning papers.
Senator JONES. How do you remember that?
Mr. McCANN. Because I remember seeing him.
Senator JONES. You remember seeing him do it?
Mr. McCANN. Yes; I was standing in front of him.

Again, reading from page 6985:

Mr. MARBLE. Mr. Browne was right there in his seat from half past 10 o'clock in the morning until about half past 2 or 3 o'clock?
Mr. MCCANN. I do not know whether it was half past 10 or not; it was between 10 and 10.30.
Mr. MARBLE. From the time he came in, between 10 and 10.30?
Mr. MCCANN. Yes.
Mr. MARBLE. He was right there in his seat?
Mr. MCCANN. Right there in his seat.
Mr. MARBLE. And he never left at all?
Mr. MCCANN. He never left.
Mr. MARBLE. Until after the senate went out.
Mr. MCCANN. Until the senate went out.
Mr. MARBLE. And nobody came and spoke to him in that time?
Mr. MCCANN. No.
Mr. MARBLE. You are just as sure of all of that as you are that Mr. Meyers did not come and speak to him?
Mr. MCCANN. Yes.
Mr. MARBLE. Absolutely?
Mr. MCCANN. Yes; absolutely.
Mr. MARBLE. You had no chair there?
Mr. MCCANN. No, sir.
Mr. MARBLE. You stood up all the time?
Mr. MCCANN. Yes.
Mr. MARBLE. Did you get pretty tired?
Mr. MCCANN. Yes, sir.

George W. Alschuler, one of Senator LORIMER's active Democratic supporters and a personal enemy of Senator Hopkins, testified that it was from three-quarters of an hour to an hour after the members of the senate entered the hall of the house for the joint session before the voting began (p. 6091); that he did not observe Browne's movements between 10 and 12 o'clock (p. 6096); that he might have talked to numerous members within that time, but after the senate came in Browne sat quietly all the time, except when speaking, for two hours, and during that time no member approached his desk or talked to him.

I read from his testimony, volume 6, page 6094:

Senator KERN. So during the whole two hours he sat there surrounded by these members, but practically alone, in that nobody spoke to him and he did not speak to anybody. Is that true or not?
Mr. ALSCHULER. That is my judgment.
Senator KERN. No, no. Do you remember that as an independent fact?
Mr. ALSCHULER. It is true; yes. It is true. I swore to the fact that it was true. But now there may be a possibility—I may swear to a thing and still be mistaken, you understand. I may swear that you are sitting there, and you may not be there. But I swear that for that period of two hours I was watching Mr. Browne; I could not help but watch him. I was sitting back of him, and I could not help but see Mr. Browne; and if anybody had come there within those two hours I would have known it.
Senator KERN. Yes. And therefore you are entirely positive that during the two hours nobody spoke to him and he spoke to nobody?
Mr. ALSCHULER. That is the best of my knowledge and belief.

I might observe here that this boy McCann, who was then perhaps 16 years old and probably 18 when he testified—though I am not sure as to that—has been provided for. He has been given a place in the sheriff's office in Sangamon County, Ill., just as Robert E. Wilson, that notorious member who paid out the jack-pot money at St. Louis, was, after his infamy was disclosed, given a lucrative position in the county clerk's office of Cook County, which he now holds. And Senator Jandus, the man who corroborated Broderick's testimony, which testimony is now conceded to be false, has been given a lucrative place in a county office in Cook County, which he now holds. It shows a method in taking care of witnesses there. It is the same method that was proposed, as I shall show later on, by Lee O'Neil Browne with Charles A. White in order to quiet him when he began to show signs of recalcitrancy.

But to go on with this; the testimony of McCann is contradicted by that of Representative Henry A. Shephard, a Democratic friend of Senator LORIMER, who voted for him on the last ballot and who figures prominently in this investigation.

Mr. Shephard testifies as to Browne's movements just before the senate members entered the house for the joint session. After referring to a conversation with Representative Alschuler, his examination proceeded as follows. I will read all of Mr. Shephard's testimony on this point at this time, because it not only throws light on the question as to where Browne was and what Browne was doing immediately before the vote commenced, but it also throws light upon the question as to why Mr. Shephard, a Democrat, voted for Mr. LORIMER on the last ballot:

He—

had been out somewhere and came in to take his seat. As I recall that conversation—they had nicknamed me "Shep"—he said, "Shep, there is going to be something doing to-day for United States Senator." He said, "Are you with us?" I replied, "For LORIMER?" He said, "Yes." "No; not me, George," I replied. That closed that conversation.

Skipping a few questions that are immaterial, Mr. Shephard proceeds:

Then, after that, perhaps 10 minutes, or perhaps a little more than 10 minutes, Lee O'Neil Browne came down the aisle. My seat was on the aisle. He asked me if he could see me a few moments. We went back to the main entrance to the assembly room, and we stood by the side of the door and conversed. He asked me if I was not going to vote for LORIMER. I said, "No, Lee; I can not do it." He said, "Are you going to throw us all down?" I said, "I never threw anybody down in my life. I never promised you that I would vote for LORIMER." Then I recalled the conversation that I had had with him the night in the St. Nicholas Hotel.
Mr. MARBLE. Tell us what you said about it.
Mr. SHEPHARD. I said, "You remember the conversation I had with you in the St. Nicholas Hotel that night, when I made the remark that I could be induced to vote for LORIMER if I could get a promise from him that that postmaster should not be appointed, and your reply to me was, 'That can not enter into it,' and I answered you then, 'Well, nothing else will induce me to vote for him'"; and he said, "I answered you in that way because I supposed that your Congressman was a Republican and that it would be up to the Congressmen to appoint the postmasters." He said, "I had forgotten that Mr. RAINEY was the Congressman from your district, a Democratic district." He said, "The Senators, Senator CULLOM, and Senator LORIMER if he is elected, will appoint all the postmasters in Democratic districts." He said, "LORIMER will make you that promise." I hesitated. I said, "I don't like to do it, Lee." He said, "Well, we have been expecting you to vote for him." I said, "You have been reckoning without your host. I never intended to and never promised that I would vote for him." After some hesitation I said, "Well, do you suppose he would make me that promise now?" He replied, "I know he will, and he will keep it." He went on, "He is back in the speaker's room; go back and see him." I hesitated a few minutes. "Well," I said, "I believe I will"; and I went back, and I saw Mr. LORIMER in the speaker's room. Do you want my conversation?
Senator KERN. Did anybody go in with you?
Mr. SHEPHARD. Mr. Browne. He went with me to the door and started to introduce me to Senator LORIMER. Senator LORIMER said, "I have met Mr. Shephard before." I had met him in Washington. I said, "Mr. LORIMER, I have been asked to vote for you for United States Senator. There is only one condition in the world under which I would vote for you." I told him that an editor in our town, a man who edited a Republican paper, had been maligning me and libeling me—not only me, but my family and my business—for 9 or 10 years, and that if I could get any assurance from him that that man or the man under whom he was then serving as deputy—Mr. Richards was the postmaster and Mr. Becker, the editor of the paper, was his deputy; that Becker had been postmaster before and then Richards was his deputy; then Richards got the appointment and made Becker his deputy—I said if I had the assurance that neither Becker nor Richards would be appointed postmaster at Jerseyville, I would vote for him. He said, "Mr. Shephard, I promise you to do all in my power to prevent the appointment of either of those men." I said, "I will vote for you, then." That is all the conversation we had.

Now, mark:

I went back into the assembly room, and as I got in there the senators were just coming in for the joint session.

That shows conclusively that as to this period between 10 and 12, during which McCann testifies Mr. Browne was in his seat all the time, he is entirely mistaken, Mr. Shephard corroborating Mr. Meyers on that proposition.

Shephard proceeded further as follows:

The senator from my district, Frank W. Burton, sat alongside of me at nearly every joint session. I told Senator Burton what I was going to do, and he said, "You are making a mistake." He said, "You are playing Jerseyville politics, and I would not do it." I replied, "I promised Mr. LORIMER that I would do it, and I am going to do it." On the roll call in the joint session I voted for LORIMER.
Senator KENYON. Did you do it because of this promise that you have told about?
Mr. SHEPHARD. Yes; I did.

Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne testified that he did not remember whether or not he took Shephard to LORIMER, as the former testified, but said:

I would not be surprised if I did.

Senator LORIMER, while not agreeing entirely with Shephard's version of the conversation, testified that such a conversation occurred on the day of the senatorial election.

George Meyers's statement must stand. All efforts to overthrow it have proven futile and ineffectual. It is only necessary, if it is true, to show Browne's connection with Senator LORIMER to make this palpable attempt at bribery a determining factor in this investigation, for it shows conclusively the character of the methods employed in the election, and, with the other circumstances developed by the evidence, makes the case impregnable.

I had intended the other day to call attention to the testimony of Senator Landee as to a visit of Mr. Hughes, Mr. LORIMER's business associate, on the Sunday prior to the election. Mr. Hughes tells us that he was soliciting support for Mr. LORIMER all over the State amongst members of the legislature at such points as he happened to be, and that he was deeply interested in Senator LORIMER's success. Senator Landee testified that Hughes came to his house and offered him Federal patronage, telling him it would be to his advantage to vote for LORIMER, feeling him out, apparently, carefully and cautiously; that these advances were indignantly repelled, whereupon Mr. Hughes went away. Landee, who was a staunch supporter of Hopkins, also testified that about three weeks before the election Representative Charles Luke told him to tell Hopkins that he—Luke—could get him 10 votes if he would do the right thing. That afterwards on the night after the election Landee asked Luke why he had not voted for Hopkins, and he replied, "Hopkins would not come across."

I do not know that I shall refer to Luke's testimony again, and therefore I will add here that Charles Luke is the man who has since died. He seems to have been addicted to the excessive use of intoxicating liquor. His widow testified that her husband received a telegram from Wilson to come to St. Louis just as Beckemeyer and these other witnesses say they received telegrams from Wilson to come to that city on the day they received the bribe money in July, 1909. She testifies that this telegram came between July 5 and August 5, and that in response to that telegram her husband went to St. Louis, and that about that time she saw in his possession $950 in money. She did not ask him where he got it or what he was going to do with it, and he never volunteered to her any information as to where he got it or as to what he intended to do with it.

I will now call attention to some new testimony.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. LORIMER. Would the Senator from Indiana have the Senate understand that Mrs. Luke testified that she saw a large sum of money in the possession of her husband before he went to St. Louis or after he went to St. Louis?

Mr. KERN. I will answer that question. Is the Senator through with his inquiry?

Mr. LORIMER. Yes; that is all.

Mr. KERN. On the first hearing she said she thought it was before he went to St. Louis. At the last hearing she was not certain whether it was before or after he went to St. Louis. But she was altogether sure that she had seen, or he had read to her, the telegram that Wilson sent to him asking him to come to St. Louis on that day. She was sure that he went to St. Louis on that day, and that about that time this sum of money was in his possession.

I was about to call the attention of the Senate to a line of testimony that was not introduced at all on the former hearing. That is the testimony respecting the conduct of Representatives W. C. Blair, J. H. De Wolf, and Henry L. Wheelan, and Senator Jandus, of Chicago; also a few more facts respecting the conduct of Henry L. Shephard.

It appears from this evidence, and from the evidence that was adduced in the former hearing, that White had a large sum of money after the Wilson visit and after the other visit; and White is corroborated by the testimony of Thomas P. Kirkpatrick, a reputable man, who saw him deposit a large sum of money, in large bills, with the cashier of the Grand Leader Co. in St. Louis for safe-keeping overnight.

It is in evidence that Beckemeyer received a large sum of money in bills of large denominations from Browne and Wilson; and he is corroborated by the testimony of men who saw these bills of large denominations in his possession.

Senator Holstlaw testifies that he received a large sum of money; and his testimony is so overwhelmingly corroborated now that the majority of the committee concede that he did receive the two sums of money as testified to by him.

William C. Blair, who is a lawyer of southern Illinois, residing in a small town, a man of dissolute habits, bankrupt in finances, a man who owned a little home in a little town with a $1,300 mortgage on it, who owed all the banks in the town, and who, as he says, owes $2,000 in bills around over the community in which he lived—this impecunious man was seen in the month of July by some of his neighbors at a baseball game exhibiting eleven $100 bills. Considering the character of the man and his financial condition, and his general impecuniosity, such an exhibition naturally excited the attention of his neighbors. So one of them, a merchant, asked him where he had obtained so much money. He said he had been over at Olney, Ill., which is the home of Thomas Tippitt, the leader of one of the Democratic factions, on some legal business, had been consulted by a client and had been paid this sum of $1,100.

When Mr. Blair was brought before the committee he first testified that he had four or five $100 bills that he had entrusted to his wife, and that she had placed them in a closet in their house. A little later he testified that there might have been some five or six $100 bills in this closet. A little later he testified that he had from eight to eleven $100 bills in the closet. He testified that on the morning of the baseball game he was at home; that he became intoxicated to some extent; that he went down to his house, took this money out of the closet, and proceeded over to the ball game in another town. On being asked by members of the committee where and how this money had come into his possession—of course everybody understood that he had not received it from any client—he undertook to explain his possession of the money by saying that his salary as a member of the legislature was $2,000 a year; that early in the session he had drawn probably $600 of it; that the remaining $1,400 was left in the State treasury until the close of the session, which was about the 4th of June; that he had then drawn the $1,400 from the State treasury; that a considerable part of it was in $100 bills; and that the $100 bills that were in the closet at this home, in his wife's possession, were undoubtedly a part of his salary that he had drawn on the 4th of June.

That was a fair accounting for the transaction. Yet it transpired from the books of the State treasury and from the books of the bank in his town that he had drawn the last dollar of his salary early in February; that he had deposited the warrants in his bank at home, and that it had been all paid out on his indebtedness and checked out, until in July he had an overdraft of $1.40 at the bank. He was confronted with the books of the bank and the books of the State treasury, showing that his statement was utterly false; and he admitted then, of course, that the books were correct.

Then the question recurred: "Where did you get the money?" And that man was not able to account for the possession of a single one of the hundred-dollar bills; not a single one.

He denied that he had been in Olney, the home of Thomas Tippit, on the day of the baseball game or the day before. He denied that he had seen Thomas Tippit at Olney about that time. Thomas Tippit testified that he had not seen Blair about that time. After Mr. Blair was confronted with the hotel register in Olney and it was shown to him that he had registered there on the night before the day of this baseball game, he was unable to account for his presence there. A little later Mr. Rowland, an editor and lawyer who lives in Olney, testified that on the morning of that day he saw William C. Blair come to the courthouse steps, where he was sitting, inquiring for Mr. Tippit; and the ex-county judge of that county, Judge MacNeill, testified that on the same morning he was talking with Mr. Blair on one of the public streets of Olney, and that Mr. Tippit came along and they greeted each other by shaking hands and walked off together.

So it is definitely fixed that Blair was in Olney, the home of Thomas Tippit, immediately before he went to the baseball game, immediately before he was seen in possession of this large sum of money, and that he went from there to the baseball game, where he exhibited the money. The fact that he denied being in Olney and the fact that Tippit denied seeing him in Olney speak volumes on the question as to where he got the money, the hundred-dollar bills—bills of like character to those that were paid out by Browne in St. Louis in June and those that were paid out by Wilson in St. Louis in July.

Take the case of John H. De Wolf, a very voluble gentleman, I think a farmer—perhaps I should say an agriculturist—by profession. He is the gentleman, you will remember, who asked White on the day before the senatorial election if he had been up to the trough yet, and on receiving a negative answer said, with an oath, "I have been up to the trough and got mine," explaining that by testifying that if he did use the language attributed to him by White he evidently referred to the bar, because he always called the bar the trough, and that this was one of his favorite expressions.

It transpired that John H. De Wolf, soon after this grand distribution of money was made to members of the Illinois Legislature in the summer of 1909, purchased a tract of land, and in the first payment on the purchase price he paid six $100 bills. De Wolf was brought before the committee and asked as to the fact of this payment, which he did not deny, and then the question was, of course, Where did you get the money? Mr. De Wolf said he took the money out of the old family Bible at his home; that he had kept those six $100 bills between the lids of that sacred volume for several months before the purchase of the land.

Then the questioning was pushed a little further. "Where had you procured the money that you put in the Bible?" He did not remember. He said it might have been at a sale; but it was developed pretty accurately on cross-examination that he could not have received that money at the sale. He did not know of anybody in all the world who had ever paid him a hundred-dollar bill. He was one of the Democrats who voted for LORIMER on the theory that it would contribute to Democratic harmony and success.

Take Mr. Henry L. Wheelan, representative of the Rock Island district. Mr. Wheelan had been in the employ of the liquor league of the State, or of the antiprohibition organization, for some time as an election agent. Mr. Wheelan bought a piece of property soon after the distribution of the jack-pot money, and it happened that in the first payment he laid down ten $100 bills. When asked where he got these hundred-dollar bills he gave an extraordinary account, in which he was corroborated. He said he borrowed three of the $100 bills from an ex-policeman, who was a stonecutter by trade, and that he had borrowed the other seven $100 bills from a lawyer who lived in Rock Island, whose name I do not now remember. He had not given any security for the money. He had no property except this home he was buying, and he had made a payment on that, I believe, of $700 in addition to the $1,000 borrowed from these two friends.

These men were brought before the committee. The ex-policeman said he had loaned Wheelan three $100 bills. "Did you have a bank account?" "Yes; I had an account in the savings bank." "How did it happen that you were carrying these three $100 bills around in your pocket for an indefinite time?" He was unable to give any reason save he wanted to keep his wife from knowing that he had that particular sum of money.

We brought the lawyer on the stand. He said he had these seven $100 bills on his person for at least a week or 10 days; that there was a bank in which he did business right across the street from his office. When asked why he carried seven $100 bills around in his pocket for that period of time instead of putting them in the bank where he deposited other money, he could give no reason for that except he heard that Wheelan wanted to borrow some money, and he was carrying the seven $100 bills around in his pocket until such time as Wheelan might call on him to get the money.

Take Senator Jandus, of whom I spoke a little while ago. He paid out large sums of money about this same time. Hundred-dollar bills were found in his possession. It was shown that Jandus had been borrowing money of his distinguished colleague, Senator Broderick, down at Springfield, while the legislature was in session—at least $145; which he says might have been a poker debt or something of that sort; but Mr. Jandus in explaining his possession of this large number of $100 bills told the committee that he had in his office in Chicago a vault—such a vault as is usually found in offices in cities—with an iron door, opening into a closet, and in that vault he kept a tin box in which he had $5,300, mostly in $100 bills; that he had been accumulating that money for two or three years; that whenever he received a $100 bill he would go and put it in that box. His office associates had access to that vault. There were other employees about the office. He said he had a bank account and named the bank where he kept his account, but that for two or three years he had been accumulating this money, putting none of it in his bank. The only reason he gave for this extraordinary proceeding was that being in politics when men came around to borrow money he would show by his bank book that he had a small balance, whereas if he had had a large sum of money in bank he would have been annoyed by their importunities.

So we have these four members of the legislature—perhaps others—living in different parts of Illinois, none of them accustomed to having money, some of them impecunious and bankrupt, appearing with bills of these large denominations, about the same time, and none of them able to give a reasonable explanation as to how they received the money or any part of it, all of them being alleged Democrats who betrayed their party and voted for the candidate of the opposition. From these facts the inference is irresistible that the hundred-dollar bills found in their possession came from the same common fund which supplied the money for the bribery of White, Beckemeyer, Link, Luke, and the other men whose guilt is either admitted or conclusively shown.

A word further concerning this man Henry L. Shephard. Shephard says he was present in St. Louis by the invitation of Lee O'Neil Browne in June, 1909; that he met all the confessed bribe takers save Holstlaw, there in Browne's room in the Southern Hotel; that when Wilson came to distribute the money in St. Louis a month later, he happened to be in St. Louis on that day, accidentally met Luke upon the street, and Luke gave him the information that Wilson was at the Southern Hotel; and that he went up there and saw Wilson and these other members of the legislature there. He testifies that Wilson called him into a bathroom, separate and apart from the others, just as Beckemeyer says he called him into a bathroom when he paid him the $900, but that he saw no money. Here comes a remarkable circumstance. He testifies that immediately after leaving Wilson and his fellow legislators on that day he went across the street to a safety-deposit box that he had rented in St. Louis, and there indulged in the pleasant pastime of clipping coupons off some bonds that he had in that box.

Right here I pause for a moment to comment upon the fact that Mr. Shephard, who is a banker in a thriving town in Illinois, having presumably a vault and safe of his own, instead of keeping his papers, his deeds, and his bonds in his own bank, in his own safe, in his own vault, rents a safe-deposit box in St. Louis for the purpose of keeping conveniently his valuable papers.

On the former hearing Shephard testified that it was before he saw Wilson on that day that he went to his safety-deposit box, but afterwards when he learned there was a record kept by the safety-deposit company of the time of day at which each box is opened, Mr. Shephard changed his testimony, and on this hearing admitted that it was after the Wilson visit.

The testimony shows further in that connection that Mr. Thomas Tippit, the leader of one of the factions, also felt it necessary to have a safety-deposit box rented in his town. Mr. John Broderick, whose business was keeping a saloon, the State senator who paid bribe money to Holstlaw, found it necessary to rent a safety-deposit box for the keeping of his valuable papers, and I think the testimony will show that there were other members who had use for safety-deposit boxes about that time.

With reference to Shephard's testimony, I call your attention to the fact that on hearing that White was talking something about a disclosure, Mr. Shephard went to Chicago at once to consult Lee O'Neil Browne and Robert E. Wilson. On arriving at Chicago he registered under an assumed name at the La Salle Hotel. He testifies that having knowledge that when Browne was in Chicago he stopped at the Briggs House he just took a chance of calling up the Briggs House to see if Browne was there. He ascertained that Browne happened to be there, and he went down, found that Bob Wilson also happened to be present, and talked over the alarming situation with Mr. Browne and Mr. Wilson on that occasion.

In this connection also let me say that it develops from the evidence here that immediately upon the visits of White and the detective, Tierney, to various parts of the State previous to the publication of the White story, that there was a general hurrying about over Illinois by numerous members of the legislature. We find Beckemeyer going to Springfield to meet Wilson and registering under an assumed name. We find Mr. Browne and Wilson and the various leaders of these factions pursuing the most devious courses and ways in their efforts to conceal their movements about this particular time.

It is true that this evidence is circumstantial evidence, but in many cases of like kind it is not only the best evidence but the only obtainable evidence. As I stated the other day, men engaging in transactions of this kind, bribe givers and bribe takers, never reduce their agreements to writing. They never call witnesses to their infamous transactions. The men who engage in the business of bribery are past masters in the art, and they are selected because of their willingness to commit perjury, if necessary, to screen the men who are higher up. A man who would not commit perjury for the protection of the men who furnish the money in the first place would never find employment in this dangerous trade.

I am glad that the circumstantial evidence in this case has been so strong, so irrefragable, so overwhelming as to convince my friends of the majority of the committee of the truth of Holstlaw's statement that he received $3,200 from Senator John Broderick in July and August, 1909. I am glad, as I stated the other day, that the members of the majority so recognize the value and weight of circumstantial evidence that the chairman of the committee now declares before the Senate that he has a fixed belief in the existence of the jack-pot fund in the Legislature of Illinois prior to the senatorial election of 1909. Of course we must rely——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. KERN. I do.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I did not quite catch the finishing sentence of the Senator's remarks as to my admission.

Mr. KERN. I was congratulating the majority members of the committee on the fact that they had recognized the value and weight of circumstantial evidence to such an extent that they now have declared here that they believe in the existence of the jack-pot fund in the Illinois Legislature prior to 1909.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is all right.

Mr. KERN. I am sure my friend will take no exception to that.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Not at all.

Mr. KERN. I was trying to pay him a compliment, and I am glad that he now accepts it as such.

I was going on to say that in cases of this kind there is seldom any evidence save circumstantial evidence. There can be little evidence in cases like this other than circumstantial evidence, except where by mischance some of the miscreants are trapped and in order to escape punishment are induced to tell the truth.

The story as to how these gentlemen were trapped in this case, as to how their confessions were induced, is of interest. Beckemeyer, Link, and some of the other legislators who were in St. Louis on the 15th of June, visiting Browne, and again in July, to meet Wilson, were called before the grand jury, and testified positively they had not been in St. Louis at all on either of those days. This distinguished statesman, Robert E. Wilson, who had paid them the money on the latter date, had been so indiscreet as to register at a hotel. When he was called before the grand jury he testified that he was in St. Louis on the date named in July, and then testified that he had seen these other men there. So, when these gentlemen were confronted with the statement of Mr. Wilson that he had been in St. Louis on that date and that he had seen them all there in the Southern Hotel, realizing that they had been guilty of rank perjury in their statements in denial of the fact that they had been there at all, they concluded to make a clean breast of the whole matter, and started in to tell the truth. They did tell the truth without any hope of reward or fear of punishment, save that which would properly and legitimately enter the mind of a malefactor who had been detected in perjured testimony, and who was desirous of making terms with officers of the law. The confessions of these four men, which were discredited and laughed at at the former hearing, are, as I said the other day, fortified and buttressed by circumstance after circumstance, until all doubt of the truth of the confessions is eliminated from the case; so, strengthened at every hand until, as I have said before, the majority members of the committee are compelled to admit that Senator Holstlaw did receive $2,500 from Senator John Broderick in June or July, the date that he fixed, and again that he did receive $700 in the month of August. So, in Holstlaw's case, at least, all doubt has been removed, and there is a unanimous opinion on that subject.

I now come, Mr. President to a discussion of the testimony of Charles A. White, and I am going to discuss that in the light of the new evidence in the case. I shall not discuss, as I now think, the testimony of any other of the witnesses who confessed to their wrongdoing. At the former hearing it seemed to have been conceded by all Senators on both sides of the question that White was essentially a bad man—a hardened criminal. There was no man on the floor of this Chamber, sir, during the last debate, who had a word to say of Charles A. White except of condemnation. If Senators will allow me, I want to show something of White's life and character as developed for the first time by the evidence on these hearings and of his connection with this affair. Then I shall undertake to show the connection between White and Browne, and then I propose to show the connection between White and Browne and the junior Senator from Illinois.

I think the reason for the universal condemnation of White on the occasion of the former debate was that the Burrows committee had made no effort to throw any light at all on his life or antecedents. He was simply pictured here as a hardened wretch, a man so vile as to be placed outside the pale of decent society. In this investigation the matter of White's life was gone into to some extent; and let me briefly, and as rapidly as I may, give you some of the features of his career.

He was born down in the mountains of Tennessee in July, 1881. He lived with his parents in and about Knoxville and Johnson City until he was 21 years of age. He was brought up in a good family, surrounded by wholesome church influences. He worked all his life, be it said to his credit. Before he was 21 years of age he had attended a business college in Knoxville. On January 15, 1901—he was then 20 years of age—he received a certificate from that college certifying to his high character and his capability. From February, 1901, to June, 1902, he worked in a department store at Knoxville as a floor walker. On June 23, 1902, he received from the manager of that store a certificate to which I desire to call attention, because it is important, as I think, that we should know something about the life of this man before we entirely condemn him. This young man was then 21 years of age, and he was only 27 when he first became involved in these affairs:

To whom it may concern:

The bearer, Mr. Charles A. White, has been in our employment for the past 19 months, for the first 4 months in the capacity of a salesman, when he was promoted to assistant floorwalker, afterwards being promoted to floorwalker, which position he has been holding for the past 12 months.

We have always found him to be an honest, upright, and energetic business young man.

We therefore take pleasure in recommending him to any person wishing such a man in their employment.

He leaves this firm of his own will and accord, and any favor extended Mr. White will be greatly appreciated by us.

Very respectfully,

M. M. NEWCOMER & Co.,
Per M. M. NEWCOMER.

He took that certificate with him to St. Louis—he was then of age—as he started out into that western country to make his way and better his condition, as thousands of other young men from the older States have done before him. At St. Louis he worked for the International Mercantile Agency. In October, 1902, he received a certificate of character from that company. A little later, in 1903, he was in the employ of the Simmons Hardware Co., the greatest hardware company in the world. I ask you to listen to what the Simmons Hardware Co. had to say of Mr. White at that time—he was then 22 years old:

To whom it may concern:

This is to say of Mr. Charles A. White that he entered our employ on February 16, 1902, and was with us until May 23, 1903, when he was temporarily laid off on account of reduction in our force.

During the period specified he was employed first in our entry department and on March 11, 1903, was transferred to our buying department, where he was employed in a clerical capacity. In both positions he discharged the duties intrusted to him in a satisfactory manner, and while with us he impressed us as being a gentleman of most excellent character and habits.

We will be pleased to hear of his success in any enterprise in which he may engage.

Very respectfully,

SIMMONS HARDWARE Co.,
R. M. BURTON, A. G. M.

Then, finding that he could secure better wages as a street car conductor, he entered upon the duties of conductor of an interurban line, and continued to work as such conductor until 1907, he then being 26 years old. He manifested interest in the labor problem and was an officer in the local union of the street car employees. The State organization of the union had such confidence in him that in 1907 they elected him as legislative agent to attend the Legislature of Illinois to look after labor legislation. He went there in the discharge of the duties of that position, and there became acquainted with Lee O'Neil Browne. In 1908 he became the Democratic candidate for member of the legislature in his county and was elected. He continued his duties as street car conductor all through the campaign, going out at night to attend to his canvass, and did not give up this position until almost the time of the meeting of the legislature. Then he went to Springfield as a member of the legislature. Before that time, however, he had been in correspondence with Lee O'Neil Browne, who had invited him to a banquet at Chicago to attend a meeting of his friends and also a meeting of the State central committee. I call your attention to a letter written White by Browne on the 1st of January, 1909, after the Chicago banquet and before the convening of the legislature:

OTTAWA, ILL., January 1, 1909.

HON. CHARLES A. WHITE,
O'Fallon, Ill.

FRIEND WHITE: I hope you will find it possible to be at Springfield early Monday, or, better still, Sunday some time. While we have the other crowd beaten forty ways, as you saw clearly at Chicago on Monday—

That was the occasion of the banquet—at the same time we must not let up for a minute. I shall rely on such good, solid friends as yourself and others like you to keep up the good work. All the members will get in Monday, and I would like to have you there and meet them and interview all the new members who are not with me. Try to get there early. My best regards to you, old man. We will win in a walk. Excuse long hand, as, being a holiday, my help is all off watch.

Sincerely,

LEE O'NEIL BROWNE.

Now, mark the postscript:

P. S.—Have you sent for your transportation as yet?

Chicago & Alton, write to president Chicago & Alton Railroad, Railway Exchange Building, Chicago, Ill.

Illinois Central, write John G. Dieman, general counsel, Park Row, Chicago, Ill.

Wabash Railroad Co., write Col. Wells H. Blodgett, general counsel, St. Louis, Mo.

Pullman passes, write Hon. John H. Runnels, general counsel Pullman Parlor Car Co., Pullman Building, Chicago, Ill., for one-half dozen sets Pullman passes and return, good 60 days.

More later as soon as lists are made out.

There was part of the first introduction of Charles A. White to Lee O'Neil Browne. Here was this young man from Tennessee, unacquainted with the ways of the world, knowing nothing of politics or politicians, knowing nothing of the devious ways that were about to be opened to him, receiving an invitation from one of the recognized leaders of his party to apply to the railroad corporations for the transportation that would carry him over the State—giving him information that would tempt him to apply for Pullman passes, and, as will be shown a little later, induced him to apply for telegraph franks and little accessories that seemed to be necessary in the early stages of the work of debauching public officials.

Counsel for Senator LORIMER in his brief filed here has declared that Charles A. White is a moral leper, and we all concede it; but there was no leprosy about him when he first became acquainted with Lee O'Neil Browne. Nobody shunned White on account of his leprosy at the time he became acquainted with the Senator from Illinois. If he is a leper, or if he was a leper in the fall of 1909, he was stricken with the malady sometime between the date when Lee O'Neil Browne tempted him by suggesting that he get passes from the railroad and Pullman companies and franks from the telegraph companies and the time when he accepted from Lee O'Neil Browne the money for his vote for Mr. LORIMER for United States Senator from Illinois. I do not believe it was charged, even then, that he was a leper. It is only since the exposure came—since this man, either from a good motive or a bad one, has unfolded this corrupt condition of things—that he is charged with the disease of leprosy and is made the subject of this wholesale denunciation.

Let us run along with this. We have now reached the 1st of January.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think the Senator has overlooked some evidence relating to Mr. White during the session of 1907, when he was a legislative agent.

Mr. KERN. I have not overlooked it at all.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Very well.

Mr. KERN. I regarded that evidence as absolutely incredible and unworthy of belief. But even admitting that it was credible, admitting that he said something in 1907 that would indicate that he was corrupt in mind, still Senators must be driven to confess the truth of the proposition that up until the time he encountered the Legislature of Illinois, up until the time he breathed the foul air of that modern political Gomorrah, he was entirely free from this malady of moral leprosy.

I call attention to another fact respecting White, and I hope Senators will not lose sight of it. In this Illinois Legislature, at its commencement, when there was a combination between Democrats and Republicans for the election of E. D. Shurtleff as speaker, Charles A. White was the only man who had the courage to stand out and vote for a Democrat for that position. In so doing he exhibited independence of character rarely found in a young man entirely inexperienced and untrained in political matters.

White testifies that a little later, about the time the legislature convened, he received the passes for which he had applied, as suggested by Lee O'Neil Browne; that he received the Western Union frank and the Pullman transportation; that when the Illinois Central pass was handed to him it was accompanied by a request that he vote against a certain bill in which that company was interested. Mr. White testifies to conditions in Springfield that disclose some things as to the method of conducting affairs there that are not testified to nor contradicted by anybody else. For instance, he testifies that there were 137 janitors in the lower house of the legislature, and that he was allowed to name a janitor who did not do a day's work during the whole session, so far as he knew, and that the most reckless extravagance prevailed on every hand. That was the condition of things in Springfield at the time Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne began to exert his baleful influence over this inexperienced young Tennesseean.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KERN. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President, if it does not annoy the Senator.

Mr. KERN. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cummins	Lippitt	Shively
Bailey	Curtis	Lodge	Simmons
Bourne	Dillingham	Lorimer	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	du Pont	McLean	Smith, Md.
Briggs	Foster	Martin, Va.	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Bryan	Gardner	Myers	Stephenson
Burton	Guggenheim	Nelson	Stone
Catron	Heyburn	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Clapp	Hitchcock	Overman	Townsend
Crawford	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Warren
Culberson	Jones	Perkins	Wetmore
Cullom	Kern	Pomerene	Williams

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. KERN. Respecting the election of Senator LORIMER and the connection of Mr. White with that election, I read from White's testimony on page 2469, which refers to a conversation between White and Lee O'Neil Browne on the subject of the senatorial election. It was after their first conversation on the subject in which Browne had proposed to pay White for his vote, but had not named the purchase price:

Mr. WHITE. I went to his room.
Mr. MARBLE. Who was there.
Mr. WHITE. Mr. Browne.
Mr. MARBLE. Anyone else
Mr. WHITE. No, sir.
Mr. MARBLE. What was said then?
Mr. WHITE. He said, "Charlie, old boy, what seems to be troubling you?" I told him, "Nothing, Lee, only I would like to know what the members are getting out of this proposition, or what I am to get out of it." I do not remember the exact language now. He said, "Can't you trust that to me, old boy?" I said, "Yes, I can do that; but I want to know." He said, "You are to get $1,000, and it is ready cash, too." I told him all right; that that was what I wanted. He cautioned me again about keeping quiet. He said, "Don't talk to anyone. Keep this under your hat"; and he remarked again that he was suspicious of the little place above there that they called Joliet.
Mr. MARBLE. Was anything else said:
Mr. WHITE. That is the substance of the conversation then. During that conversation I did ask him what there was from the other resources. He said, "The jack pot won't be distributed for about three months after the legislature adjourns. There will be about that much or possibly a little more later on."

A little later he received from Browne as part payment, as he testifies, a $100 bill, that the bill had some pencil marks on it, and that he gave it back to Browne, telling him he "did not want to take any chances on passing that bill then," or words to that effect, whereupon Browne had the bill changed into others of smaller denominations.

The legislature adjourned about the 4th of June, 1909. On June 9 Mr. White, being impecunious and having started a business in East St. Louis which was not paying him, wrote a letter to Mr. Browne telling him of his financial needs, whereupon Mr. Browne wrote to Mr. White this letter under date of June 9:

My dear Charlie—

I invite attention to the endearing terms in which, in all this correspondence, Mr. Browne addresses Mr. White.

I did not get home until the night of Monday, June 7, when I found your letter awaiting me. I wish you had spoken to me of the matters contained in your letter before we left Springfield. It would have been comparatively easy for me at that time to have advised with you personally and properly. It is far more difficult now, and I would hardly know what to say to you without seeing you personally. In any event, unless you would care to see me before that time by coming here or meeting me in Chicago, I expect to see you and have a visit with you sometime within the next two weeks. I shall be only too glad to advise with you along the line of the matters referred to, and suggest anything that may be appropriate and proper. You know where I stand, old man, and that I will go my length for you. Should you find it necessary to see me before the end of the next two weeks, you had better arrange to come to Chicago and meet me there. However, as matters stand, and in the way that I am tied up with business matters now, I would prefer to put off the meeting for the length of time I have stated. I want you to feel and realize that I am as good a friend as you have in the world, and that I am not only willing but ready to do anything in my power for you any time. My best regards to you.

Very sincerely, your friend, LEE O'NEIL BROWNE.

On June 13, only four days later, another letter having passed from White to Browne, Browne wrote this letter:

OTTAWA, ILL., June 13, 1909.

FRIEND CHARLES: Your letter did not reach me till too late to do any good. I was in Chicago, but could not have remained longer had I got your letter. Got home here this evening and am due in court to-morrow a. m. But, Charlie, I will be in Chicago Tuesday or Wednesday sure (this is under your hat, though, for I do not want to be bothered by every job hunter in Chicago). If you can wait, I'll do my best to see you. I'll be at the Briggs when there.

In haste. BROWNE.

The words "but" and "will," in the sentence "But, Charlie, I will be in Chicago," are italicized.

Mr. White testifies that he went to Chicago; that he received $50 from Mr. Browne on the evening he reached there; that on the next day—I quote from White—

There was some talk about members, etc., and Mr. Browne gave me seventeen $50 bills, picked from a roll of money that he had in his pocket, and said: "There is $850, and with the $100 I gave you in Springfield and the $50 I gave you last night it makes a thousand dollears—all of your LORIMER money." I placed the money in an envelope in my inside coat pocket. He noticed me do this, and he took a safety pin from the table and came over and pinned it in my pocket. He cautioned me not to go back to O'Fallon or East St. Louis and pass the $50 bills at public places, because some one would get suspicious or become suspicious. During this conversation he said that some of the Chicago members wanted to handle the Chicago end of it, but that he was going to handle it himself. He went on to say that a little later on, about the 15th of July, he would be able to give me that much or a little more—possibly a little more. He told me that he expected to be in St. Louis in a few days and meet these members from southern Illinois and give them their money. I requested him to let me know when he was down there, and I told him I would come over and meet him. He did not do it, though.

Prior to June 24, Mr. White suggested to Browne something about taking a trip. This shows the fellowship that existed between these two men, one a leading lawyer of Illinois, a leader of the Democratic Party of that State, a man of great intelligence, an eloquent and persuasive orator, a man whose personality would of necessity attract young men desirous of advancing their interests and making their way in the world.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 20182) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before asking that the unfinished business be laid aside I desire to state that I am anxious to take up this chemical schedule bill to-morrow. I do not think it will take us very long to dispose of it. I hope that we may be able to conclude the debate and have a vote on it to-morrow. I recognize, of course, that the matter which is now before the Senate is one of the highest privilege, but I trust that the members of the committee who have it in charge and who are going to participate in the debate will not insist upon keeping this question before the Senate to-morrow to the exclusion of the unfinished business.

I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. WARREN. I take it the Senator from North Carolina means to lay it aside for the day.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly. I understand that to be the effect of the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be followed. The Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, the date of the payment of the money by Browne to White in Chicago was the 16th of June. A little later Mr. White had written Mr. Browne suggesting a trip of some kind, to which Mr. Browne responded as follows:

And I invite especial attention to the language of this letter—

DEAR FRIEND CHARLIE: Yours received. Your plan of a trip certainly sounds awful good to me, if it could be brought about, but, unfortunately, I'll not be able to get away at all this summer for any extended trip. You see, I've lost a whole year out of my business, and it will keep me guessing all summer to get my delayed stuff in shape for the fall. If I was situated as you are, I'd plan for a trip out there sure about the 10th of July, and I'd have a good time.

Now, mark these words:

Perhaps, however, you better wait and save the money for the next campaign. I'll see you again before very long. My best regards to you, and—be a good boy.

Always your friend,

B.

He had just paid him $850, a week or so before that, and when the boy is proposing to him a pleasure trip this experienced legislator suggests to him that perhaps he had better save the money for the next campaign. This evidence shows that at the time he paid White the $850 White had no money at all—was utterly impecunious—so that when Browne told him here that he had better "save the money" he could have only referred to the bribe money that he had paid him only a few days before.

This takes us to the 24th of June. On the 14th of July Mr. White received the following telegram, similar in all respects to the messages received by Beckemeyer, Link, Luke, Clark, and perhaps Sheppard:

To Hon. CHAS. WHITE, O'Fallon, Ill.:

Meet me to-morrow forenoon without fail at Southern Hotel, St. Louis; wire me answer at once care Briggs House, Chicago.

ROBT. E. WILSON.

The fact that that telegram was sent is not denied. The fact that White responded to it by going to St. Louis on that day is not denied. The fact that he there met Beckemeyer, Link, Luke, Clark, and Shephard is not denied by anybody. The only fact that is denied by Wilson is that he paid them any money on that day. Mr. White gives an account of the meeting at St. Louis and the payment of the money similar to that given by other witnesses. On the following day he received the following letter from Lee O'Neil Browne:

OTTAWA, ILL., July 16, 1909.

Hon. CHARLES A. WHITE, O'Fallon, Ill.:

FRIEND CHARLIE: Thank you very much for your prompt recognition of my request in the Doyle matter—

That was a request that Browne had made of White to telegraph the governor in the interest of one Doyle, who desired an appointment—

You have certainly been one of my good old friends since we have become acquainted. I feel sure that that friendship will last just as long as you and I do. I was awfully sorry that I was unable to be with you yesterday forenoon in St. Louis—

Referring to the Wilson meeting, which occurred the day before in St. Louis—

I was taken very ill in Chicago Monday night with an attack of ptomaine poisoning and have had a pretty serious time of it. I did not dare to attempt the trip.

That is why I said the other day that Robert E. Wilson, who carried that money to St. Louis on that day, was the accredited agent of Lee O'Neil Browne, who, but for his sickness, would have been there and distributed it himself.

Now, mark the further points of this letter:

I hope everything is all right with you and satisfactory—

Italicized—

and that you are happy and fairly prosperous—

Italicized—

I hope, before very long, to be able to meet you either in St. Louis or Chicago and talk over old times. I think you and I have got one real good visit coming. Let me hear from you when you get time and the spirit moves you.

Very sincerely, your friend,

LEE O'NEIL BROWNE.

Lee O'Neil Browne knew that White had received $900 at the hands of Wilson on the previous day, and it was because of that knowledge that he expressed the hope that "everything is satisfactory and you are fairly prosperous."

Going on a little further, chronologically, we come to the meeting between White and Browne at Chicago, when with some boon companions they took numerous trips on the lake. They remained together several days, and Mr. White describes their performances as a very carnival of debauchery, and in this he is corroborated by other testimony. In testifying as to his financial condition at the conclusion of this period of revelry, Mr. White said:

Well, when I went to Chicago on that trip I had $550. I loaned Mr. Browne $220. Mr. Browne paid me back $20 before I left Chicago after we had made those trips, and I had run out of money, and he let me have that much back to pay my hotel bill. Then afterwards he sent the $200 to me by Mike Giblin—

Who was some kind of a private secretary of Mr. Browne.

On the 27th of August Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne telegraphed Mr. White from Ottawa to Chicago that Mike Giblin would see him the next day at the Briggs House; that Giblin came according to Browne's promise, and refunded to White for Browne the $200 the latter had borrowed. That $200 was spent by September 8, 1909.

It is shown that by this time Charles A. White was thoroughly debauched. He had learned to drink to excess; he had been taken to houses of ill fame; he had been brought into contact with the most depraved people in the world by Lee O'Neil Browne and his other associates who were members of the Illinois Legislature. His downfall was now nearly assured—a pitiful spectacle, as we think back only a year before, when he stood a young man of good habits and high character who was freely received into the company of men of the highest grade in the State of Illinois and enjoyed the confidence of all who knew him. He then, being impecunious, wrote a letter to Browne, as follows:

O'FALLON, ILL., September 8, 1909.

Hon. LEE O'NEIL BROWNE, Ottawa, Ill.

FRIEND LEE: I don't like to write and ask a favor of you, but if you can accommodate me with a little money until I can get to work at something and pay you back I will certainly appreciate it. This is the honest truth: I have only 90 cents in money—all the money I have in the world—and, you see, I am boarding—have been for eight years. If you can let me have a little money, fill in the amount on this note which I am making to you, and some day you will get every cent of it back.

Everything is quiet here—like Sunday or a holiday every day.

Trusting I will hear from you at an early date, I remain,

Your friend,

CHAS. WHITE.

He inclosed his note for $50, and on the following day—observe the promptness with which this great lawyer and statesman responds to the request of this young man who is now denounced as a leper:

OTTAWA, ILL., September 9, 1909.

FRIEND CHARLES: Just got your letter. Am awfully sorry for you, old pal, because I know how true a good fellow and gentleman you are. Your fault, old pal, is in trying to go too ——— fast. You must cut it out for awhile, old boy. I'll do all I can to land you a job, but do not yet know when LORIMER will be able to do anything; or, rather, when he will do anything. But I'll do all I can, Charlie. Am pretty hard up myself, after the fierce vacation we all had, but have managed to scratch out a fifty for you. Hope it will do some good, anyway. I am down at the "grind" again, working like a slave. It's sure h—l, after the "music and flowers" we had for a time this summer. But when a thing has got to be done I can always shut my teeth and go to it. It's the only way. It's hell, but that's the price we pay for most of the pleasure of life. I always did, at least. Good bye; old man, and God bless you. Wish I could do more for you.

Your friend,

LEE O'NEIL BROWNE.

P. S.—I hope you will do all you can to help James Morris, our old pal, pull through. He must win, he says.

That is September 9. Mr. White, on September 16, telegraphed again. That $50 was sent him. In less than a week Mr. White had requested a conference at Chicago. Browne telegraphed as follows:

OTTAWA, ILL., September 16, 1909.

To Hon. CHARLES A. WHITE,
O'Fallon, Ill.:

Impossible to be in Chicago Saturday or Sunday; sorry, but unavoidable.

LEE O'NEIL BROWNE.

A little later White wrote another letter. I do not see that it is dated. It is as follows:

Hon. LEE O'NEIL BROWNE, Ottawa, Ill.

FRIEND LEE: I received your telegram yesterday—

Referring to the telegram I have just read—and I am very sorry I can not get to see you in Chicago Sunday, because I am in such a position here that I am embarrassed to death.

Now, Lee, I don't want you to feel that I am trying to work you or stick you for a dollar, but, by the grace of God, every cent you have let me have you will get back some day with interest.

I am down and out financially. There is no one that I can go to here and get a few dollars from. You can't imagine how it makes a fellow feel to be in such position, and the fall right here on him. I have some clothes waiting me in St. Louis that I ordered six weeks ago. I owe my tailor $85, and he has been expecting me to come in and pay him and get my clothes for the past three weeks. But, like a fool, I went the limit of what I had on my foolish stunt in Chicago, never dreaming that I would spend all I had.

Now, I am going to ask you to try and do me a favor, and if you can I promise you that the obligation will be met and that you won't lose a penny. Will you see if you can get me the money on the note I am inclosing to you ($100)?

That will make $150 I have borrowed from you since I saw you in Chicago about the last of August.

You may have your doubts about me, but my record is open, and I defy any man to show that I have beat any honest debt.

I would like to know as soon as possible about this, because I am in the mire to my neck now. Don't be under the impression that you will lose anything you let me have, because if I live you will get every cent back that I get from you.

With best wishes, your friend, CHAS. WHITE.

He adds:

Lee, I am making this note read for $125 with interest at 6 per cent.

Now I am willing to allow you the additional $25 interest on the $100, so will put it in so there can be no question about interest in case I should die. I need the money and need it bad, and would feel like giving two hundred for one hundred in order to get the money. I am making the note for one year, but if I can pay it in 30 or 60 days I will do so, or just as soon as I can.

WHITE.

Mr. Browne responded September 23. I will not read all this letter. He inclosed a draft for $50. It is, in part, as follows:

I do not know what you are thinking of, my boy, to get yourself into a position of this kind. I do not want to preach to you, but you certainly are not very wise in your generation. I will tell you, Charlie, you must just simply take the situation by the neck and get down to hard tacks and go to work. If you can not get what suits you, get something else. You know that you got to do something, and when you are in that position, do not be too particular about what you do. LORIMER is tied up so that he can not move a hand, at the present time, in the way of getting jobs. When he does get so that he can move, I will do anything in my power to help you. And, as you know, there is no other avenue through which I can move. I am awfully sorry that you are in your present financial condition, Charlie, but really, don't you know, you have nobody to thank for it but yourself. You certainly could have used more judgment and foresight than you have, under the circumstances. Now, brace up, old man, and surprise yourself and everybody else by making good. It is in you, and all you need is a little nerve at the present moment. I hope and trust you will do everything in your power at that convention at Belleville to see that Jim Morris lands. My best regards to you. I will write you again before very long. Am working hard.

Very sincerely, your friend, LEE O'NEIL BROWNE.

October 1, 1909, Mr. White began to make some veiled threats as to what he might do. I call attention to a letter, as follows:

O'FALLON, ILL., October 1, 1909.

Hon. LEE O'NEIL BROWNE,
Ottawa, Ill.

FRIEND LEE: I am inclosing you herewith a note for the $50 you loaned me. I appreciate this assistance very much.

I will pay this note off as soon as possible, also the other note for $50 you hold against me. I am doing nothing at all, and can't say when I will find work.

My regrets at present are from my experience that I let the better judgment of myself drift along the wrong channels. I am going to try and aright all of that in some way; can't say what my destiny will be, but I believe it for the best.

Have my ring in pawn for several dollars, and am financially down and out. The future of every man's life brings some interesting surprises, so I presume we should not be surprised at anything in these wonderful day.

If I live long enough I expect to repay you every dollar that you have give me.

Don't be surprised at the future of any action that I may make.

With best wishes, yours,

CHAS. WHITE.

A little later he wrote a letter to Senator LORIMER, as follows:

Hon. WILLIAM H. LORIMER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: My present circumstances compel me to inquire of you if it is possible for you to assist me in securing a position. I have not found anything in the way of a position since the legislature adjourned, and to be plain with you, and absolutely out of money, with no resources to fall back on. I lost considerable money in a business undertaking and presume I owe somewhere in the neighborhood of $500 now. I do not like to ask you to assist me in securing some sort of a position that will place me on my feet again, but I know of no other person at present that is in a better position that could assist me.

Possibly there is something in the Secret Service or investigation department that you could secure for me. Kindly drop me a line and let me know if you can place me somewhere. With best wishes, I am,

Respectfully, yours,

CHAS. A. WHITE.

O'FALLON, ILL., October 19, 1909.

Senator LORIMER did not answer that letter; but on the 24th of October, 1909, the subject matter of that letter is referred to in a letter received by White from Lee O'Neil Browne:

CHICAGO, October 24, 1909.

FRIEND CHARLIE: Have been trying to land something for you. I came up yesterday and had a visit with LORIMER in the afternoon for about half an hour. He goes back to Washington in December, at which time he feels that he can probably place you along the lines you suggested in your last letter.

That is a position in the Secret Service that they are promising this young man, who is now fast becoming a leper.

In the meantime, he is arranging to give you a temporary job up here as clerk in some one of the offices.

Who is proposing to give this man, a man who lives away down in southern Illinois, near St. Louis, a position in a county office in Chicago? Senator LORIMER. Why? Why should Lee O'Neil Browne be soliciting Senator LORIMER in the interest of this impecunious young man, who has now become a common borrower and deadbeat, and to whom Senator LORIMER should be under no obligation in the world to procure a position in one of the county offices of Cook County and bestow it upon that kind of a man, who lives 150 or 200 miles from Chicago?

I will get word down home the early part of the week—

Let me go back and read that sentence:

In the meantime, he—

That is, Senator LORIMER—

is arranging to give you a temporary job up here as clerk in some one of the offices. I will get word down home the early part of the week, and then I'll let you know and will come up here and report to LORIMER'S secretary, who will take you out and place you.

Is there no connection between these three men? Are there Senators upon this floor who will stand up and say there is no evidence here connecting Senator LORIMER with Lee O'Neil Browne, connecting Senator LORIMER, Lee O'Neil Browne, and Charles A. White together, in the face of this testimony? Proceeding:

See? The salary of the temporary job will not be very high, probably $75 per month, but it will help you get through all right until I can land you better after a while. If this thing does not suit you well enough to take it, you must wire me at Ottawa as soon as you get it. However, in your present condition, I think you had best take it. I am awfully sorry, Charley, that you are situated as you are, but really you are not entitled to a whole lot of sympathy, it's largely your own fault, you must get down to cover and learn that you must cut your coat according to your cloth. You know I am fond of you and will do anything I can, but this does not blind me to your faults and the fact that you are not at all consistent in your expenditures. My very best regards to you, old pal, and remember that I will do all I can.

Your friend,

LEE O'NEIL BROWNE.

November 2, a little over a week after that time, comes this telegram to Charles A. White from Lee O'Neil Browne:

Dated OTTAWA, ILL., 2d.

To Hon. CHARLES A. WHITE, City:

Report to Charles Ward, secretary to Senator LORIMER, ninth floor Rookery Building, Chicago, at once. Tell him James L. Monaghan, in the Country Building—

"County Building," it should be—wired me to have you report for duty. If you do not find Ward, go at once to Monaghan; he has you placed. Wire me at once, so I may know you got this letter to you to-day, care Briggs House.

LEE O'NEIL BROWNE.

Another telegram, November 1, that should have preceded the last one read, is one to Lee O'Neil Browne, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., November 1.

LEE O'NEIL BROWNE,
Ottawa, Ill.:

Send White to me. Have arranged for him to work week ago.

JAMES L. MONAGHAN.

The next day the following letter from Lee O'Neil Browne was received by White:

OTTAWA, ILL., November 2, 1909.

Hon. CHARLES A. WHITE,
C/o Briggs House, Corner Randolph Street & Fifth Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

FRIEND CHARLIE: I inclose telegram received by me this morning from James L. Monaghan, in the county building of Chicago. He "owns" one of the offices in the county building, and can be found there. He is one of the prominent fellows in Cook County, and everybody knows him. I wired you this morning, instructing you to go to Chicago at once. You are to go at once to Charles A. Ward, secretary to Senator LORIMER, on the ninth floor of the Rookery building, on La Salle Street, and tell him who you are and that you were sent there by me in response to a telegram from Monaghan. He will at once take you over to Monaghan, or send you over to him with a note. In case you find Ward out, you will go at once to Monaghan and tell him who you are and that you were sent there by me in response to his telegram. Monaghan will at once place you at work. As I told you in a letter some days ago, this job is only temporary, and will pay you probably $75 a month. As soon as Congress opens in December, or shortly after, LORIMER thinks that he will be able to place you at something more remunerative, and something that will enable you to be in your home district more of the time. In any event, this was the best that I could do for you at this time, and, under the circumstances, it will help out a whole lot.

Signed "Lee O'Neil Browne," after a moral lecture delivered to Mr. White as to his future conduct in the concluding part of the letter. November 5 White wires down again for $25, and I believe he had no answer to his telegram. A little later Mr. White telegraphed Lee O'Neil Browne as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL.

HON. LEE O'NEIL BROWNE,
Ottawa, Ill.:

Kindly inform Charles Ward, LORIMER's secretary, that I will not accept temporary $75 position.

CHARLES A. WHITE.

That is the end of the story, Mr. President, up to that time. Here was a man, utterly broken financially, impecunious, a borrower, who had become thoroughly debauched from association with statesmen of the type of Lee O'Neil Browne, rapidly approaching that period when he might be pronounced a common "dead beat," beginning to threaten as to what he might do in the future. Then follow these efforts on the part of Lee O'Neil Browne and of the Senator from Illinois to placate him, finally culminating in their securing for him and offering to him a position in a Republican county office in Cook County. I spoke a moment ago of this queer situation of a United States Senator securing a position for a citizen and voter of southern Illinois in one of the county offices in Cook County. It becomes still more strange when we consider that the man applying for the office is a Democrat of pronounced type and one to whom this Republican Senator is presumably under no obligations whatever.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. LORIMER. Will the Senator from Indiana indicate in what part of the record there can be found any testimony which will even suggest that in any sense of the word LORIMER was trying to placate White?

Mr. KERN. If it is not shown in the correspondence; if it is not shown by the fact that, in response to a letter written by White to LORIMER, Lee O'Neil Browne suggests that LORIMER will place White by and by in the Secret Service of the Government, and temporarily in a Republican county office in Chicago—if that does not show it, then there is no force or effect in plain words written plainly.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana further yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KERN. Yes.

Mr. LORIMER. Would the Senator from Indiana have the Senate understand that he belives that when a Senator attempts to aid a man who has voted for him for United States Senator to secure an appointment of any kind at any place that is an evidence of corruption?

Mr. KERN. Is that your question?

Mr. LORIMER. That is the question.

Mr. KERN. Standing by itself, I would say "no"; but taken in connection with the thousands of circumstances that surround this case, I would say "yes."

Mr. LORIMER. Then will the Senator indicate what testimony there is in the record that tends to show that in any way the Senator from Illinois was trying to placate White, because of knowledge on the part of White of any corruption in the election of a United States Senator?

Mr. KERN. I will come to the relationship between the Senator and Lee O'Neil Browne a little later on; and it is upon that relationship, testified to by both, and the subsequent conduct of the three parties concerned that I have made the statement which I have made.

Mr. President, much has been said in this controversy about the source from which this money came in the first place. The original source of the corruption, I am free to state, has not been discovered. I might add that the first source of money employed in legislative corruption has been discovered but few times in this country. The men who originally furnish the money are so hidden and have such facilities for protecting themselves that it is almost impossible to catch them in any dragnets that may be thrown out. There is testimony showing that a man who was seemingly more vitally interested in the election of Senator LORIMER than anyone else was talking about money, was seeking to collect money, was making statements about where contributions for reimbursement might be sent, but as to the original source, there is no evidence here which satisfactorily discloses it.

The record shows a sharp issue of veracity between Clarence S. Funk, general manager of the International Harvester Co., and Edward Hines, a millionaire lumber dealer of Chicago, who seems to have been one of Senator LORIMER's chief supporters, concerning a conversation which occurred between them a few days after the senatorial election.

Mr. Funk, who had not been interested in political matters and unquestionably a man of high character, testified very positively that a few days after the election he met Hines casually in the large lounging room of the Union League Club of Chicago, of which club both were members; that Hines approached him saying, "Hello! you are just the man I am looking for," or "that I wanted to see"; that they walked over to a couch and sat down, when Hines proceeded as follows: "Well, we put LORIMER over down at Springfield, but it cost us $100,000 to do it," or "about $100,000"; that Hines went on to explain that they had to act quickly when the time came and did not have time to consult anybody. Then he said, "So we put up the money. Now we are seeing some of our friends to get the matter fixed up." That Funk then inquired about how much he was getting from his different friends, and he said, "Well, we can only go to a few big people, but if about 10 of us would put up about $10,000 apiece we would clean it up." Funk then asked him why he came to him, and he said, "Because you are as much interested as anybody in having the right kind of a man in Washington"; that in the conversation Hines said, "Just send the money to Ed. Tilden." Funk swears that he refused to have anything to do with it, saying "We are not in that kind of business."

Mr. Hines admits meeting Mr. Funk at the Union League Club, fixes the date as May 27, the day following the senatorial election, and also admits that a conversation occurred respecting the election of Senator LORIMER.

He says that he was sitting on a sofa in the main lounging room with two of his employees, Baker and Hall, and one Carney, a lumber dealer of Marinette, Wis., talking over a lumber deal; that he saw Funk approaching them and arose and shook hands with him; that Funk said, "I am very glad to hear that Mr. LORIMER has been elected Senator," or words to that effect, whereupon he—Hines—said, "I am pleased that you are glad that he is, and he ought to make a good representative of the State"; that Funk then said, "I would like very much, at your earliest convenience—or convenience—if you would arrange to introduce me to Senator LORIMER. I have never met him, and I would like to have you introduce me to him," to which Hines rejoined that he would be pleased to do so; that Funk then took him—Hines—by the arm, and they walked toward the club exit, and that at the exit Funk said: "The Senator must have been put to more or less expense in the contest for the Senatorship, and he ought not to stand that. The business interests ought to take it off his hands. We would like to contribute to that expense"; that he—Hines—replied that he did not know anything about the matter but would see and let him know; that Funk then left, and he—Hines—returned to the sofa, where Carney, Baker, and Hall had remained while this conversation with Funk had been taking place.

Notwithstanding the partial corroboration of Hines's story by his friend and customer, Carney, and his employees, Baker and Hall, all of whom testify that they saw Funk approach Hines in the Union League Club and heard him express pleasure at the election of Senator LORIMER, I am thoroughly convinced of the absolute truth of the testimony of Clarence S. Funk, and if the Senate will indulge me I will give the reasons for that belief.

In the first place, Mr. Funk declares that he had taken no interest in the senatorial election and had not the slightest personal feeling against Senator LORIMER.

As shown by the testimony of Cyrus H. McCormick and by his conduct on the witness stand, Mr. Funk is a modest, quiet man, not given to much talking. He bears the reputation of an honorable gentleman, and no evidence was offered by way of impeachment of that reputation.

In this connection, I wish to say, I have a letter this morning from one of the most prominent Republicans in Indiana, one of the greatest manufacturers in the country, Joseph D. Oliver, of the great Oliver Chilled Plow Works, at South Bend, Ind. He addresses his brother-in-law, Hon. George Ford, and says:

OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
OLIVER CHILLED PLOW WORKS,
South Bend, Ind., June 5, 1912.

Hon. GEORGE FORD,
South Bend, Ind.

MY DEAR MR. FORD: The Lorimer case now pending in the United States Senate, in which the Hon. JOHN W. KERN, United States Senator from Indiana, is an active participant, presents some very peculiar features which, in my opinion, are totally unwarranted. The friends of Mr. LORIMER, in an attempt to bolster up his case, have raised the question of veracity betwen Mr. Clarence S. Funk, general manager of the International Harvester Co., and Edward Hines, of the Edward Hines Lumber Co. Mr. Funk is attacked in the most outrageous and indecent manner, his private character assailed, and every possible effort made to discredit him. This is vindictive persecution and should not be tolerated. I know Mr. Funk intimately and well. I know that among his Chicago neighbors and friends his word is regarded as unimpeachable, and of my own experience I know that he is thoroughly reliable and in all respects a man of the highest character.

I deem it my duty to go on record as a believer in Mr. Funk's rectitude as against all defamers, and I wish Senator KERN to know my views on the subject. Because of your long-standing personal acquaintance with Mr. KERN and the fact that he does not know me personally, I venture to ask your good offices in placing my views before him for such use as he may care to make of them, together with any comments of your own that may occur to you as being proper under the circumstances.

Very sincerely, yours, JOSEPH D. OLIVER.

At the first apportunity Mr. Funk related the circumstances of his meeting and conversation with Hines to his superior officer, Mr. McCormick, and to Edgar A. Bancroft, attorney for the Harvester Co., in substantially the same way he related it to the committee. Afterwards, when the question of corruption in the senatorial election became a subject of general discussion in the newspapers, in the clubs, and elsewhere, he repeated the same statement in confidence to his friend, H. H. Kohlsaat. There was no earthly reason why this man of irreproachable character and high standing, connected in no way, directly or indirectly, with any of the political factions in Illinois, having, as he swears, no particle of ill will toward Mr. LORIMER, should invent and repeat a deliberate falsehood and follow it up with the commission of willful perjury in his statements before the committee.

On the other hand, Edward Hines never repeated his version of the conversation to any living soul save to his attorneys until he stated it on the witness stand before the committee.

Funk told this story on the 5th of April, 1911, before the Helm investigating committee at Springfield. It was widely published throughout the United States and was the subject of general discussion.

Mr. Hines had appeared before that committee previous to that date, namely, on March 28, and testified positively that he had never discussed with anyone the question of raising money to aid in Mr. LORIMER's election, and that he never heard the question of raising money discussed either before or after the election. (See p. 32, Report of Helm Committee.)

On April 25 Mr. C. F. Wiehe, Hines's brother-in-law and business associate, appeared before the Helm committee, took part in the cross-examination of a witness, and stated to the committee in writing that he was there representing Edward Hines.

Mr. Hines was interviewed by newspaper reporters, but made to none of them the statement that Funk had approached him with the proposition to contribute to a fund for the reimbursement of Senator LORIMER. The fact that a voluble talker like Mr. Hines concealed this important fact would naturally excite astonishment amongst those who knew him, but the testimony of his star witness, Baker, throws much light upon his remarkable reticence.

I invite the attention of those who are interested in this matter to the wonderful performance of this man Isaac Baker, by whom Mr. Hines undertakes to corroborate his own testimony.

Mr. Baker testified on direct examination, with great attention to every detail, of the meeting between Funk and Hines, that Hines, Hall, and himself had gone together to the Union League Club in an automobile to meet Mr. Carney; that after their arrival the four of them sat together on a lounge on the left side of the entrance discussing the value of the lumber which Carney was proposing to sell to Hines; that a gentleman came up and said, "How do you do, Mr. Hines," and Hines got up and shook hands with him, and he made the remark, "I see that Senator LORIMER is elected, and I am glad of it." Mr. Hines said, "Yes; I think he will make a good representative"; and the gentleman said, "I have never met the Senator, and I would like to be introduced to him." At that he turned around and they walked off toward the exit, about 10 feet from the lounge, and engaged in further conversation, which he did not hear, after which Mr. Hines returned to the lounge and said to Mr. Carney, "That is Mr. Funk, the general superintendent of the International Harvester Co.—a small man for a large position," or something to that effect. (Vol. 2, pp. 1431–1432.)

He remembered distinctly that as Hines and Funk left the lounge Funk took hold of Hines's left arm at or near the elbow. (Vol. 2, p. 1448.) Now, remember that Funk had testified before the Helm committee on April 5. Baker says he first discussed the Funk testimony with Hines about 10 days thereafter, which would make that conversation about April 15, 1911. (Vol. 2, p. 1441). That in that conversation he asked Hines if that was the man we met at the Union League Club; that he was surprised to see the testimony he had given after he seemed so pleased when he met Mr. Hines in regard to the election of Senator LORIMER. "Then," he says, "Mr. Hines wanted to know how we came to be there—

That was on the 15th of April when Baker and Hines were discussing Funk's testimony—

Mr. Hines wanted to know how we came to be there, and I said we were there on some business, and he wanted to know who was there with us, and I told him I thought one of our managers was there, because we had telegraphed the manager of our mill and met him there. (Vol. 2, p. 1442.)

Mr. Hines said he could not remember who was there at the time. "I thought it was Mr. Whitten, one of our general managers, and he thought it was another one of them, and found out it was not.

Now, listen—

I was then going to Buffalo and Cleveland, and I told him it was some lumber deal, and it might have been one of our customers in Cleveland or Buffalo who was there, and he told me to go and see them and find out if they were there about that time, which I did, and found they were not. (Vol. 2, p. 1442.)

This witness says that he went to see Mr. Gynn, of Cleveland, in May, and then inquired of Mr. McLeod in Buffalo, and then of Mr. Silverthorn, of Tonawanda. He swears that during this time he had no recollection that Hall or Mr. Carney were present. The evidence shows that this search for the right men continued from April 15 until some time in June.

On June 8, more than two months after Funk had testified at Springfield, Mr. Carney received a letter written by Edward Hines, asking him to go over his records and memoranda and see if he did not come to Chicago to meet him (Hines) during the latter part of May, 1909. In the letter Hines says he has a recollection of meeting him (Carney) about that time, and adds—mark the words—

Can you find out if you were in the city and whether you met me between May 26 and June 1, 1909, as I wish to place an incident about the time you met me?

Yours, very truly, EDWARD HINES.

(Vol. 1, p. 1050.)

Let it be observed that the versatile Mr. Hines had an incident in his possession that he was exceedingly anxious to "place." He could not "place" it prior to the 26th, which was the date of LORIMER's election, but would not hesitate to "place" it on any day thereafter, which might correspond in a general way with the Funk testimony.

Carney responded by telephone, informing Hines that he was in Chicago May 26 and 27. He swears that after thinking the matter over he had no recollection of the meeting in the Union League Club, that the matter had passed out of his mind entirely, but that after 20 minutes' conversation with Hines on the 10th of June, when he was made to remember that he, with Hall, Baker, and Hines, was sitting on a lounge in the Union League Club talking when a man with a smile on his face came up and Hines got up and stepped out 3 or 4 feet to meet and greet him; that witness could not hear a word that passed between them; that Hines and the stranger walked off, as he believed, out of sight (vol. 1, p. 1053); that after an absence of four or five minutes Hines returned and said, "Well, Carney, that is not a very heavy fellow for a fellow holding down a big job, is he?" I said, "No, sir; he is not." He said, "That is Mr. Funk, general manager of the International Harvester Co." Witness says he never saw Funk before or since. (Vol. 1, p. 1048.)

Mr. Hall remembers his movements on the 27th of May, 1909, with great accuracy from the time he had his breakfast until he went with Hines and Baker and met Carney at the Union League Club; remembers how he sat with reference to Hines; saw a man come up and shake hands with Hines, saying, "How do you do, Mr. Hines?"; that Hines called the man Mr. Funk; that Hines and Funk stood right in front of him and talked, Funk saying, "I am very glad that Mr. LORIMER has been elected Senator." Hines expressed himself as being pleased, whereupon Funk asked Hines to introduce him to the Senator at his convenience. Then Funk took Hines by the arm and they walked out 10 or 12 feet and stood in plain view of the men on the sofa for two or three minutes; Hines came back and said, "There is Mr. Funk, general manager of the International Harvester Co.," and he spoke of his being a small man for a large job. (Vol. 1, pp. 1064–1065.)

Mr. Hall says that he was in Chicago when Funk testified in Springfield—read that testimony April 6. That from April 6 until June 1 the circumstances of the Funk-Hines conversation came back to him gradually, so that on the latter date he broached the subject to Mr. Hines, and a little later found substantial unanimity of sentiment could be reached between the four parties on the sofa, and so the incident that Mr. Hines had been carrying around with him for two months was finally placed.

In this connection it might be well to refer to other distinguished services rendered by Mr. Isaac Baker to his employer.

It is agreed by all parties that on the day of Senator LORIMER's election Mr. Hines was in the room of Wirt H. Cook in the Grand Pacific Hotel and there had a conversation with some one at Springfield concerning the election. That episode will be discussed by another member of the committee. It is also agreed that at least four persons were present at the time of that conversation, namely, Hines and Wiehe, Cook and O'Brien.

But Mr. Hines insists that a fifth person was there in the presence of Isaac Baker. O'Brien, who is not unfriendly toward Hines, swears that he saw no person in the room other than the four above named; and Cook swears that he believes Wiehe was there, and is sure that Wiehe and Baker both were not there. (Vol. 1, pp. 628–689.)

In placing this incident it was convenient to have Baker there as the fifth man, and Wiehe and Baker, like parrots, repeat the story of the telephone conversation as told by Hines.

Also in this connection, as illustrating Mr. Hines's methods of procedure, his notions of propriety, and the accuracy of his memory, I will call attention to his efforts to induce Cook and O'Brien to leave Chicago at the time the grand-jury investigation of the White exposure was in progress, to evade the process of the grand jury.

I might add, in passing, that that was a strange performance for a man who had been engaged in a telephone conversation in which there was no harm. According to his version of the conversation there was nothing particularly wrong about it. According to the version of the conversation as heard by Cook, it was a proposition to take or send money to Springfield to influence the senatorial election, if necessary. So, I say, these efforts to induce men who listened to the conversation to get out of the way of the grand jury, lest they might repeat the conversation to that body, is somewhat of a suspicious circumstance.

Mr. Hines testified very positively (vol. 1, p. 877) that he received a telephone message from some one in Duluth, stating that Cook had been talking in a hotel in Duluth and on a train about having heard a conversation in his room in which he—Hines—had talked to some public men, and about that time the grand jury was in session in Chicago investigating jackpot bribery. The Duluth gentleman told him that if Cook was talking promiscuously like that around Chicago, it would have the effect of getting his—Hines—name drawn into it, and if there was anything in the conversation it might be well for him—Hines—to see Cook and caution him not to repeat it; that he thereupon called up Wiehe by telephone, but he was not in. After Wiehe returned from the theater, he called up Hines to see what was wanted, and Hines swears as follows as to his instructions to Cook:

> I said possibly Mr. Cook is unconsciously referring to that conversation and repeating parts of it, and if he does so around the hotels in Chicago it may come to the knowledge of the State's attorney or some of his associates, and he will be subpœnaed, and it would draw me to the State's attorney's office; and if so, I would have to disclose the conversation; that I felt that disclosing it would place some people in an embarrassing position, like Gov. Deneen, politically. It had no bearing on any information or anything affecting the subject which they were trying, as I understand, to trace down, and I would not wish to have the conversation come up. Mr. Wiehe said he would go down and explain to Cook and not have him do any talking. (Vol. 1, p. 878.)

In other words, Mr. Hines declares that the only thing he requested Wiehe to do was to go down and see Cook and request Cook not to talk.

This conversation, if it occurred, according to Hines's testimony showed a noble spirit. First, the telephone conversation, if related to the grand jury, would only burden that busybody with irrelevant matter which could throw no possible light on the subjects of its inquiry. Then the great sympathetic heart of Hines was moved compassionately toward Gov. Deneen, whom he desired to protect from any kind of embarrassment. It revealed the noble sentiments of a Christian gentleman.

But let us hear the story from his kinsman, Mr. Wiehe, who having told the story previously before the Helm committee, could not afford to "place the incident" in accordance with Hines's memory, and unfortunately the scene was so staged that the handy Mr. Isaac Baker could not be brought in.

Wiehe swears that on his return from the theater on that night he was informed that Hines had been calling for him—that he called up Hines, and that Hines told him that Cook and O'Brien were at the Grand Pacific Hotel and asked him to go down and see them. He—Hines—said the grand jury was in session, that a subpœna was out for them, that they were to be subpœnaed, and asked him—Wiehe—to tell them to keep out of the way until the matter was over. (Vol. 2, pp. 1730, 1371–1377.)

Cook and O'Brien both swear that Wiehe came to the hotel at midnight without collar, looking as if he had just got out of bed. (Vol. 1, pp. 631–697.)

Cook says that Wiehe wanted them to get out of town, saying that Hines had just called him out of bed and told him that LORIMER had just called him up and said we were in town, and wanted us to get out right away quick, or they would have us before the grand jury the next morning. (Vol. 1, p. 631.)

O'Brien, evidently friendly to both Hines and Senator LORIMER, testified that Wiehe came to the hotel and told them that Senator LORIMER had called up Mr. Hines and told him we were in town and that Hines had sent him down there to tell us to leave town, that the grand jury was in session, and that they were afraid we would be taken before it. O'Brien told Wiehe that there was no train out of town anyway, and that he did not know that he had done anything that required him to leave town.

O'Brien also testified that Wiehe told them on that occasion that there had been some talk about the telephone conversation that Hines had in Cook's room, and that was one of the reasons for urging their departure. (Vol, 1, pp. 695–698.)

I hope Senators will not lose sight of the fact that Mr. Hines stated on his oath that his only reason for sending Wiehe on this midnight mission was because some one at Duluth had informed him of Cook's volubility, and that the message sent was to Cook alone. I call attention to the following from Mr. Hines's testimony on this subject (vol. 1, p. 970):

> Senator KERN. Had you heard that O'Brien had been talking, too?
> Mr. HINES. No, sir.
> Senator KERN. Why did you send word for O'Brien to leave town, too?
> Mr. HINES. I sent word to Mr. Cook.
> Senator KERN. Did you not send word by Mr. Wiehe for Cook and O'Brien to leave town?
> Mr. HINES. No.
> * * * * * * *
> Senator KERN. You said nothing to Wiehe about O'Brien at all?
> Mr. HINES. No, sir.
> Senator KERN. Did you know that O'Brien was with Cook?
> Mr. HINES. No, sir; I did not.

Here, then, we have this man on a highly important question squarely contradicted not only by Cook, who is his enemy, but by O'Brien, who is his friend, and by his business associate and kinsman, Mr. Wiehe.

The main question to which all this is addressed is as to whether Edward Hines is a truthful man, and whether his word is to be weighed against that of Clarence S. Funk.

Another sharp issue of veracity which tends to throw light on this main question is presented by the testimony of Herman H. Hettler, a highly reputable business man of Chicago, president of the Herman H. Hettler Lumber Co.

Mr. Hettler testified that in the afternoon of May 26, the day of the senatorial election, he was in the Union League Club, purchasing cigars at the cigar stand, when Hines touched him on the shoulder and said, "Do you know the name of your new Senator?" and on receiving a negative answer, Hines continued: "It is LORIMER. He has been elected. I just finished talking with him—just left this moment," waving his hand in the direction of the telephone booth, and went on to say: "I elected him. I did it myself." (Vol. 1, pp. 1389–1390.)

Mr. Hines, while admitting that he had a conversation with Hettler that day, just after coming out of the telephone booth at the Union League Club, denies that he said he had elected LORIMER or that he had been talking with him. He swears that he does not know where Wiehe was at the moment, but that he must have been near. (Vol. 1, pp. 916–947.)

Mr. Wiehe, now almost as omnipresent as the gifted Baker, swears that he was right there and that no such conversation as that detailed by Hettler occurred. (Vol. 2, pp. 1632–1633.)

Mr. Hettler testified with absolute certainty that Mr. Wiehe, whom he knows very well, was not present at all. (Vol. 2, p. 1401.)

Donald M. Frame, the cigar clerk at the Union League Club, who was selling the cigars to Mr. Hettler, corroborates that gentleman to the extent of testifying that his attention was attracted by Mr. Hines's remark that "I have elected LORIMER our next Senator."

The variance between the testimony of Senator Aldrich and Mr. Hines on many points is sharp and striking. Senator

Aldrich contradicted squarely many of the statements made by Hines. There are numerous other illustrations in this record of Mr. Hines's treacherous memory—too numerous to review in detail.

During the closing days of the investigation a circumstance developed which throws much light on Mr. Hines's character and methods.

Miss Helen M. Seevers, a young lady of this city, telegraph operator at the Willard Hotel, testified that about two weeks previous to February 8, 1912, she had received and sent a message from A. C. Bailey, one of the Burns detectives who had testified at the hearings, to a Mr. Kerr. That shortly afterwards, on the same day, Edward Hines came up and asked her to show him the message that Bailey had filed. She continued:

I told him it was impossible; that it was against the rules of the company to show any messages at all. He said he knew it was, but that it meant a lot to him, and he would like to see the message. He said, "I will give you something if you will let me see it." So I said, "Well, I couldn't take it." I wouldn't be bribed in that way when I knew I was doing right. So then he said, "I will come back later, and you think it over." Then he came back later in the day, and asked if I had thought it over. I told him yes, but that he couldn't see the message.

Her testimony proceeded as follows:

Mr. HEALY. Did he exhibit any money?
Miss SEEVERS. Why, he offered me some money; yes, sir.
Mr. HEALY. Tell us what he offered you—just what happened in that regard. Tell us what he did and what he said about it, if anything.
Miss SEEVERS. Well, he just handed the money. He was in the office at the time, and he went out, and he says, "If you let me see that message," he says, "I will put something in your paw." Then he left the office and came back, and I saw that it was money wrapped up. I don't know how much it was, but I just saw the green. (Vol. 8, pp. 8509–8510.)

Now, how was Mr. Hines to meet that evidence given by a reputable girl who could not be bought? In going through these thousands of pages of testimony, it is refreshing to find some one, even though it be a little girl in Washington, proof against the Hines money—the kind of money that was used in the corruption of the Illinois Legislature. She was absolutely without interest in the case. What was to be done? The services of Baker could not be had. It might be dangerous to attempt to use Wiehe. The committee was ready to adjourn the hearings sine die. So this veracious witness entered upon the only open avenue, took the stand, and testified upon his oath that he had seen her and talked with her at the booth in the Willard on that day; that he had accidentally seen and partially read the message sent by Bailey to Kerr, but that he had uttered no word that could be construed into even a request to see the message, much less a bribe, and that the statements of the young lady to that effect were unqualified falsehoods. This is the man whose word, bolstered by that of his employees, is to outweigh that of Clarence S. Funk.

There is in this record another letter, the genuineness of which is conceded, which throws some light upon the character of Mr. Hines and those associated with him. I refer to the letter contained in the testimony of Charles McGowan, and I will beg the indulgence of the Senate for a moment while I find it.

I do not find the letter just now, Mr. President, so I will not weary the Senate with its reading. It was with reference to another episode which I shall not attempt to discuss, but shall leave to other members of the committee who will have more time and strength than I have to discuss it. I refer to the incident on the sleeping car between Duluth and Virginia, testified to by Mr. William Burgess, a business man of Duluth, whose character is unimpeached. Mr. Burgess swore that Mr. C. F. Wiehe then stated to him in effect that he had contributed $10,000 to the election of Senator LORIMER.
